Mr. JONES of Texas. No; it does not do that. I take it, however, that if it were desired to add new defendants after the case had been removed the court would have jurisdiction to add them.

Mr. DEWALT. In lines 9 and 10 you say "or new process as to defendants upon whom process has not been completed may be issued." Evidently that contemplates the joinder of new defendants, because they can be brought by an entirely new process.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I think that language clearly connects with the preceding and refers to those who are made defendants prior to removal but have not been served with process prior thereto. But I can see no objection to new defendants being added.

Mr. DEWALT. In a State court, if it is desired to add new defendants, you must issue a new writ entirely apart from the original writ. You could not bring them in by a rule.

Mr. JONES of Texas. They must be served with process in a Federal court.

Mr. DEWALT. The processes are different as to time and manner of service. Therefore one set of defendants has certain rights accrue to them in the State court and other defendants will not have the benefit of that by Federal process.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I will state in answer that any cause removed to the Federal court must be one which could have been originally filed in the Federal court. The Federal court would have had original jurisdiction. So the defendant who has been served in the Federal court, after removal, would have no complaint because the case might have been brought there originally.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. There has another thought occurred to me that possibly—although I am not sure, because it has been some time since I looked into the matter—that this will enable you to get a defendant into the Federal court that you otherwise could not get in the State court.

Mr. JONES of Texas. No, sir.

Mr. SINNOTT. Before a defendant joined with other defendants can remove a case to the Federal court he has got to show, in addition to other reasons, in his petition that he has a separable controversy, does he not?

Mr. JONES of Texas. That may be one ground, or rather that may enable him to show that he would have grounds but for the improper joining of some defendant.

Mr. SINNOTT. That is one ground for removal relating to the separable controversy, and he takes the case against himself to the Federal court. That gives the Federal court jurisdiction to secure service on another defendant that you could not take into the Federal court.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The Federal court can not acquire jurisdiction by simple service of process. It must be a cause that might have been filed originally in the Federal court and not subject to being remanded.

Mr. SINNOTT. In the gentleman's opinion this would not take away from the Federal court the right of remanding?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I do not think so.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield? Suppose one of the joint defendants did not desire the case to be removed, because perhaps he thought he would have a fairer trial in the State court?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I will state that any defendant can remove a case to the Federal court provided the existing facts are there. He does not have to consult the other defendants. Anyone who is dissatisfied in a cause may, on his own bond and petition, remove the case to the Federal court if the ground for removal exists.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of an objection.

Mr. STEVENSON. Reserving the right to object, I was out at the time this bill was called up. Will not this bill enable a plaintiff to have nonresident defendants, those who could not resist, defendants with whom diversity of citizenship exists, to have them served after it gets into the United States court? Then they can bring in other defendants, and they will be deprived of their rights to resist a removal. Will not that enable them to get some men into the United States court that they could not get in otherwise?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I do not think so.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Those who had not already been served would not be outside of the service if the Federal court has jurisdiction.

Mr. STEVENSON. But suppose they are served under this bill, after it gets into the United States court, and on process issued by the United States court?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. But the United States court can only take jurisdiction of cases to which its jurisdiction extends.

Mr. STEVENSON. That is true.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. And you can not get jurisdiction of the subject matter by serving a person if the subject matter is not confined to the district court.

Mr. SINNOTT. It is not only the subject matter, but the nonresidence of the defendant that gives the right of removal in most cases, but in the cause stated by the gentleman, as I remember it, if there are some defendants residents and other nonresidents, then the nonresident defendant can not remove unless there is a separable controversy.

Mr. STEVENSON. Let us suppose a case. Suppose a citizen of Virginia brings suit against two citizens of North Carolina in the eastern district of South Carolina, and three or four citizens of Virginia also, but does not serve the latter. A separable cause is made as to those in South Carolina. The citizens of South Carolina remove him into the United States court. Then the citizens of Virginia are served in the United States court and are brought in, whereas they could have resisted removal otherwise.

Mr. SINNOTT. Then they would go into the United States court and ask for a remand.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The petition must show on its face prior to removal that there is a diversity citizenship all along the line. If a man is suing a number of defendants and one of them lives in his own State, notwithstanding he has not served that man, the defendant can not remove the cause to the Federal court, because the petition must show on its face that there is diversity of citizenship as between the plaintiff and all of the defendants.

Mr. SINNOTT. Unless by asking for removal he can show that there is a separable controversy.

Mr. STEVENSON. That is the point. The defendants served may make a prima facie showing of a separable controversy from those others and that those others are not in. Then you go in there and issue process of the United States court, and I do not see how you can remand.

Mr. JONES of Texas. They must not only show the separable controversy but they must separate the controversy, because, so long as the case remains with one of the defendants living in the same State that the plaintiff lives in, and notwithstanding it may be a separable controversy, neither of the defendants can remove the cause to the Federal court because there is no diversity of citizenship.

Mr. STEVENSON. Then if they separate the controversy, why the provision for bringing in these others that are not concerned in that controversy?

Mr. JONES of Texas. The provision is not primarily for that. Let me cite this instance. Take a case filed down in Texas, where there were 40 defendants. They served 26 of the defendants and there was defective process on five of them. The cause was removed to the Federal courts by one of the defendants, and they could not complete the service of process on the other defendants. The plaintiff could not get complete justice or complete disposition of the cause by going ahead to final judgment, so he dismissed that cause, and the case has been dismissed twice and still is undecided. What recourse has the plaintiff in such a case? I do not think there can be any trouble at all on the basis the gentleman speaks of, because the decisions are as clear as they can be that if a plaintiff sues a number of defendants and any one of these defendants lives in the same State as the plaintiff the cause can not be removed.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am thoroughly familiar with that, but you admit that where there is a separable controversy it can be?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes; by going in and showing that it is a separable controversy, but so long as the existing fact remains that there is a defendant or are defendants who live in the same State as the plaintiff the cause can not be removed to the Federal court.

Mr. STEVENSON. I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] has agreed in saying that the manner of service differs in State jurisdictions from what it is in Federal jurisdictions in some cases.

Mr. JONES of Texas. In some cases; yes.

Mr. WALSH. Let us have this question of procedure definitely in mind. There are five defendants or proposed defendants. Three of them have been served according to the State process?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. Two of them, as you say, have been defectively served or the process has not been completed. By the tenor of the gentleman's bill, those two who have not been served legally are now subject, by removal to the Federal courts, to the service of process according to the Federal court rule?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. Take this concrete example: The State laws in many States provide that a corporation shall have process served upon it by the process being given personally to an authorized agent of the corporation; or in another instance, if it be a foreign corporation, that the process shall be served upon a person designated and named by the state department of the State in which the corporation does business. We will say that the time of service required is 30 days before the return day of the writ. We will say that is the State law. We will say that the Federal law, however, in regard to the two defendants who have been brought in requires only 10 days' service before the return day of the writ. Therefore you have three men who have had 30 days' time in which to prepare for the return of the writ, and the other two men, subjected to the Federal jurisdiction, have been brought in by the tenor of the gentleman's bill with only 10 days. Is that the meaning of the bill?

Mr. JONES of Texas. That is perhaps true, if that case should arise. However, none of these defendants had the right to have the case filed in the State courts. The three defendants first mentioned may have had a little more time than the others who are served in the Federal courts, and yet those who have been served in the Federal courts have all of the notice they are entitled to under the law, because the case might have originally been filed in the Federal court, and in that event all of them would have received the same notice.

Mr. DEWALT. I understand.

Mr. JONES of Texas. That only the two have. On the other hand, if you do not permit the service to be completed, two or three defendants by collusion—and I have known it to happen—may practically prevent a man from getting service, because they can hide out for a few days while one of the other defendants comes and removes the cause to the Federal court, and then the plaintiff is in the Federal court with his hands tied, not having service on all of the defendants. The Federal court, as a rule, follows the State practice in everything except in a few peculiar kinds of equity suits.

Mr. DEWALT. To my mind, you have by the provisions of your bill created a discrimination in favor of some defendants as against others. That is what I am objecting to. Because I recognize very clearly that 30 days' time before the return day required for service is of very great moment to the defendant, and here three of them have that much and two of them do not have that much, and therefore the discrimination.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. My understanding is that the length of time is governed by the State statute, that we have not any Federal statute on the subject at all, except that which directs that in the Federal courts the State practice is to be followed. And certainly there is no great grievance a person can complain of so far as the service is concerned.

Mr. DEWALT. The gentleman having admitted what is the fact—and the chairman of the Judiciary Committee will no doubt agree with that—there is a distinctive difference between the service of process in the State courts and that which maintains in the Federal courts.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. One is through the marshal and the other is usually through the sheriff, or may be served, in my State, by any individual, in most cases. But the length of time is the same whether it is served by the marshal or served by the sheriff.

Mr. DEWALT. I withdraw my reservation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DOMINICK. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill may go to the foot of the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the bill may go to the foot of the calendar. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE WABASH RIVER, ATTICA, IND.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 11606) to authorize the county of Fountain, in the State of Indiana, to construct a bridge across the Wabash River at the city of Attica, Fountain County, Ind.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have some information as to whether or not this proposes the construction of a bridge on which there shall be tolls in effect?

Mr. PURNELL. I will say to the gentleman that it does not.

Mr. HULINGS. This is not for a toll bridge?

Mr. PURNELL. It is not. It is merely for replacing a bridge that has been in existence since 1866.

Mr. HULINGS. A free bridge?

Mr. PURNELL. A free bridge. It is an emergency measure.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, I desire to inquire of the gentleman in whose city, county, and State the proposed bridge is, if this is a bridge to replace an existing bridge?

Mr. PURNELL. I will say to the gentleman that the proposed bridge is to be built, to be exact, just 40 feet upstream from a bridge now in existence—a bridge that was built in 1866, and which is now considered unsafe.

Mr. GARD. The idea is to remove the present bridge and build a bridge 40 feet upstream?

Mr. PURNELL. Exactly.

Mr. GARD. I note that the report of the Secretary of War was "at a place near"; and it was sticken out; and I was wondering, if it was absolutely to replace a bridge, if the language "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation" should remain. I expect, from the gentleman's explanation, it is all right. I suggest to him that he correct the spelling of the name of the county in line 6.

Mr. PURNELL. I will do that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the county of Fountain, State of Indiana, is hereby authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Wabash River, from a point in the city of Attica, Fountain County, Ind., to a point in Warren County, in the State of Indiana, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation at a place near a bridge now in operation and heretofore constructed by said Fountain County at said point, all in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Page 1, line 8, after the word "navigation," strike out "at a place near a," and insert "to replace the."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I have some doubt about the desirability of this amendment, and the effect of it. The purpose, I understand, is to construct a bridge at this point to take the place of a bridge which is now in existence there. That is very well; but where you strike out "at a place near a" bridge now in operation and say "to replace" the bridge, it might be required that the present bridge be torn down and a new bridge be constructed afterwards. I assume that it is desired to continue the use of the old bridge until the new bridge is constructed. I will ask the gentleman if that is the fact?

Mr. PURNELL. I will say to the gentleman that is exactly the fact, and I agree with his contention. The amendment is a proposal of the War Department, and the bill as originally drawn, as the gentleman will see, did not contemplate that addition. The bridge is to be constructed according to the plans, a copy of which I have, just exactly 40 feet upstream from the present bridge, and for the purpose of replacing it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It is for the purpose of replacing it in a way, but it is not for the purpose of actually replacing it now. You want to use your old bridge until the new one is completed?

Mr. PURNELL. Exactly.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Now, as a matter of fact, the War Department would have authority under the general bridge law to order the old bridge removed at any time, and it is not conceivable that Fountain County desires to maintain two bridges there even if they did have the authority. It may be that it would cause no trouble. Where you say to replace a bridge, it might involve the destruction of the old bridge before plans were approved for the new bridge. It does not seem to me that the language is desirable. I think the amendment ought to be voted down myself.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to correct the spelling of the word "Fountian" in line 6.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 6, correct the spelling of the word "Fountian" to "Fountain."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PURNELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS WHITE RIVER, NEAR DES ARC, ARK.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 3371) authorizing Gordon N. Peay, jr., his heirs and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge and approaches thereto across the White River.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill.

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, is that bill reported on the Unanimous Consent Calendar? It is not on the calendar I have.

The SPEAKER. It is the last one on the calendar.

Mr. GARD. When was it placed on the calendar?

The SPEAKER. On January 17. The Chair thinks it is not entitled to be on this calendar.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be placed on the Unanimous Consent Calendar at this time.

Mr. GARD. It is on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Arkansas ask that the bill be considered at this time?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill just reported. Is there objection?

Mr. HULINGS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question. It seems that Mr. Gordon N. Peay, jr., his heirs and assigns, are to have the right to operate a toll bridge. Is there any limitation on the amount of tolls to be imposed?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The general bridge law gives authority to the Secretary of War, where tolls are charged, to fix the amount.

Mr. HULINGS. Would it be possible to put in a condition by which those municipalities could take over this bridge at cost? There are two counties, I suppose.

Mr. OLDFIELD. There is only one county.

Mr. HULINGS. By which the counties could condemn it and take over that bridge? This thing of having toll bridges and toll roads is a played-out proposition. Everywhere they are being abolished. They are difficult things to get after when the right has once accrued, and it seems to me it would be the part of common business prudence for Congress to provide so that the municipality or the public could take over these bridges at cost.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I would state to the gentleman that personally I would have no objection to that.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. We could not give that right here. That would be under the law of Arkansas.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I will say to the gentleman that the town of Des Arc is probably a town of 2,000 people, and the White River is a rather wide river at that particular place, and a very fine farming section is just across the river. It is about 25 miles to any other market except this town of Des Arc. They have agitated the question of a bridge for a great many years, trying to have the city or town build a bridge or to have the county build a bridge, but they feel that they are not financially able to do it. They are very much interested.

Mr. HULINGS. I shall not object to the consideration of this bill, but I thought it proper to call the matter to the attention of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Gordon N. Peay, jr., his heirs and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge and approaches thereto across the White River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation within or near the limits of the town of Des Arc, in the county of Prairie, in the State of Arkansas, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the next section of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act authorizing Gordon N. Peay, jr., his heirs and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the White River."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the title will be amended in accordance with the text.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. OLDFIELD, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

COMMISSION CONCERNING BRIDGE OVER NIAGARA RIVER.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to the consideration of Senate bill 3427. I objected to its consideration until the call of the calendar had been completed. The call having been completed, I will withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. What bill is that?

Mr. WALSH. It is No. 118 on the calendar, Senate bill 3427.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 3427) to establish a commission to report to Congress on the practicability, feasibility, and place, and to devise plans for the construction of a public bridge over the Niagara River from some point in the city of Buffalo, N. Y., to some point in the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Reserving the right to object, the proposition to build a bridge across the Niagara River at Buffalo has been pending in some form ever since I have been a Member of Congress. I went up there once with a committee investigating the subject. Permission to build a bridge has been granted more than once, and then extended. I do not know what this commission is intended to do. I would like to ask this question, whether one of the purposes of this bill is to have an entering wedge in order to ask Congress to contribute toward furnishing the money to build a bridge up there?

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I would say in answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois that the people of that vicinity have no intention of asking Congress for any money whatsoever to build this bridge with.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. While my distinguished friend can not speak for those who may represent Buffalo in Congress many years hence, and possibly can not speak for all of them in the near future, I do want to have it emphatically stated that it is not the intention of Congress, through this bill, if it is passed, to have Congress asked for contributions of money for the construction of the bridge.

Mr. MACGREGOR. I would be perfectly willing to have it written in the bill, if that can be done.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That would not have any more effect. We have discovered at times that the strongest kind of statements do not always bind other people, notably in the case of the California exposition, where the exposition was located at San Francisco because they said they would never ask for money out of the Federal Treasury—not the same people, but other people did it for them.

Mr. MACGREGOR. It was proposed some years ago that Congress appropriate $50,000,000 or $100,000,000 for the construction of this bridge. It is now intended to be built by the people of that vicinity.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not mean to say that I would oppose the Government contributing money. It may be that I would not; I do not know. But I do not want to have a bill passed which in any sense is a subterfuge and which has an ulterior purpose not declared on its face.

Mr. MACGREGOR. I will say to the gentleman that that is not the intention at the present time and that is not the sentiment of the people with reference to this bill. The only purpose is to cooperate with the intention on the part of the Canadian people to appoint a board. We want to have a body on this side of the same dignity to go and agree with the other as to what shall be done in the matter of building the bridge.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I suppose the passage of this bill will be used as an argument for the passage of a similar bill over in Canada.

Mr. MACGREGOR. They have not done it yet.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If they had done it, no doubt the gentleman would give that as an argument in favor of the passage of this bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, when this bill came up on a former occasion on this same calendar I objected to its consideration, very largely because of the same ideas which have been brought out by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. Personally, I do not like this kind of a precedent. I do not see any real substantial reason why the Federal Government should appoint a commission ready made, men that they know nothing about; no doubt fine gentlemen, but men about whom Congress knows nothing and of whom the War Department knows nothing. The bill comes in here with no recommendation from the War Department beyond their statement that they have no objection to it. Inasmuch as we are not going to pay for building the bridge in any degree, it seems to be a matter that Congress has nothing to do with. If the people of Canada likewise want a bridge, they will meet a commission appointed by the common council of Buffalo as quickly as they will meet a commission appointed by us. But I have been led to give up my scruples on the subject and to waive any objection to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RAYBURN. Reserving the right to object, I am very glad that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asked the question of the gentleman from New York that he did. I have looked at this matter in the same way that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] stated that he did. I am not going to object to the consideration of this bill, but if I were not a member of the committee that reported it I certainly should. I can not see any reason in the world for the Congress of the United States authorizing a ready-made commission that is handed us by somebody up in Buffalo, N. Y., and it does seem to me that it is a most groundless thing for us to do. However, as I say, I am not going to object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACGREGOR. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. As I stated before, this proposition to build a bridge across the Niagara River has been pending here certainly ever since I have been a Member of the House, and that is quite a few years now. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, of which I was then a member, visited Buffalo at one time in connection with the matter. There have been a great many efforts to construct a bridge across the river there. Of course, the difficulty is in the financing of it, because it is an expensive proposition, and possibly a doubtful one from an engineering point of view. If without any liability on our part we can contribute a litle by the appointment of a commission to meet a commission from Canada concerning an international river like the Niagara, I really think we ought to make an exception. It is an exception. The situation there is entirely different from what it is at any other place.

Mr. RAYBURN. As far as I am concerned, I shall waive any objection, but I do not like the business. There is a concern up there now that have authority to construct a bridge, but they are not doing it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. They may have the authority, but they have not the money.

Mr. MACGREGOR. The others are private propositions.

Mr. RAYBURN. This is going to be a private proposition, too, is it not? When this bridge is built it will be a private proposition, will it not?

Mr. MACGREGOR. Oh, no; it will be for public purposes.

Mr. RAYBURN. But it will certainly be built by private parties.

Mr. MACGREGOR. It will have to be built by them, but it is not intended for private gain.

Mr. GARD. Is it a toll bridge?

Mr. MACGREGOR. There will be no profit derived from the bridge. The only purpose is to get a bridge across. It will be a public bridge without any profit from it.

Mr. GARD. Further reserving the right to object, the first section of this bill provides—

That a commission be, and hereby is, created, to be called the Buffalo Public Bridge Commission.

What I wish to inquire is, if the Congress passes this very unusual law and creates this public bridge commission, what supervisory authority or direction it will have over any existing project for which we may have granted the authority to some one to build a bridge over the Niagara River?

Mr. MACGREGOR. It would not have any. All that this commission would have power to do would be to confer with the commission to be appointed by the Canadian Parliament and then come back with its recommendations.

Mr. GARD. There is no restriction upon this language, and if Congress creates the Buffalo Bridge Commission and gives that commission power, as it does in section 6, to adopt rules and regulations for the conduct of the business of the commission, does not that confer a very wide discretion upon a commission which the Congress apparently knows nothing of, since it has no voice in the selection of it except to adopt the names of these gentlemen? For aught I know, they may be very proper and estimable gentlemen, but the inquiry I am making is why should we create this bridge commission and give it the power to adopt rules and regulations? By so doing may we not in effect be shutting the door to our own participation in the control of this international bridge?

Mr. MACGREGOR. It seems to me that the jurisdiction is controlled by section 3, which provides:

SEC. 3. That the commission shall inquire into the practicability, feasibility, and estimated expense of the construction of a public bridge, from some point in the city of Buffalo, N. Y., over the Niagara River, to some point in the Dominion of Canada, and devise a plan for the construction of such bridge and the manner of financing its construction.

Mr. GARD. If they do that, then in section 5 it says that they may report to Congress their findings and recommendations and submit any testimony taken from time to time, and that they shall make a final report, accompanied by any testimony not previously submitted, not later than two years after the approval of this act. In other words, they may report their findings and recommendations, and they shall make a final report, in which apparently the Congress is not interested save in the sense of preserving relations, since, as the gentleman says, there is no intention of creating any financial liability against the General Government.

Mr. MACGREGOR. They would have to come back to Congress for authority.

Mr. GARD. Under section 3 this commission is to devise a plan for the construction of the bridge and the manner of financing its construction. I presume that the latter is of paramount importance, since it is most difficult.

I question very much whether in this manner and at this time we could enter upon the passage of a bill of this kind, since, so far as the General Government is concerned, I do not see that it accomplishes anything except the possibility of creating a commission which may embarrass us in the future.

Mr. MACGREGOR. I trust the gentleman from Ohio will not object, because here is a matter, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] says, which has been pending for many years. We have been attempting to get across this river with a bridge. There is no bridge across Niagara River from Lake Erie down to Niagara Falls, a distance of 22 miles, and this bridge would connect up the highway system of New York State with the highway system of Canada. The Canadian Government has constructed on the west side of the river a boulevard along the edge of the river.

Mr. GARD. If there is a proposition to build a bridge at a point selected, why is it not the policy to ask for authority to build a bridge there, instead of creating a commission which may or may not report to Congress?

Mr. MACGREGOR. The purpose of this is to have this body cooperate and get in touch with the work of a similar commission to be appointed by the Canadian Parliament. The only purpose is to create a body which will have the same official standing as that to be chosen in Canada. It is simply an incentive or aid to getting down to some concrete settlement of the question which has been pending for so many years.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Has not a bill been passed and now in effect giving authority to certain parties in Buffalo to construct a bridge?

Mr. MACGREGOR. I suppose the authority has been given to a dozen concerns along the river.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then they have the existing authority to construct a bridge if they can finance it.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Not a public bridge, but a private bridge.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What advantage would a commission created by an act of Congress have over the existing private commission devising ways and means to finance a proposition and decide where it can be located, inasmuch as they have the authority to construct a bridge?

Mr. MACGREGOR. We have not the authority to construct a bridge.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I thought the gentleman said that they had.

Mr. MACGREGOR. The gentleman asked whether there were others.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The question I asked was, Have not a number of bills been passed authorizing the construction of a bridge and giving certain parties authority to construct a bridge, but they have never done it?

Mr. MACGREGOR. Not this bridge.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Any bridge across the Niagara River?

Mr. MACGREGOR. The authority to build a railroad bridge or a bridge for private profit. What we are trying to get is a public bridge, a great big proposititon in the city of Buffalo. It has been a proposition for years to build a bridge across the Niagara River. This is merely a small matter of aid in pushing that proposition along.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACGREGOR. Yes.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman says a public proposition. By that does he mean that the expense of building the bridge is to be met by the county in which Buffalo is situated, or the city of Buffalo and contiguous territory and the territory across the river?

Mr. MACGREGOR. We anticipate that the city of Buffalo and the communities on the other side of the river will assist in financing this proposition.

Mr. GARD. I do not want to stand in opposition to anything that will be for the benefit of Buffalo or the cities on the other side of the river. What I want to ascertain is whether this is a public proposition independent of participation of the United States in a financial way, or whether it is an entering wedge so that after the plan has been agreed upon and the Canadian Government has perhaps given $500,000 or $2,000,000 it will be said that therefore the United States should give $2,000,000.

Mr. MACGREGOR. It has been the unanimous sentiment in Buffalo that no application would be made to the Federal Government for financial aid.

Mr. GARD. How is it to be financed?

Mr. MACGREGOR. It may be financed by the city of Buffalo and the counties on the other side of the river, or it may be through public-spirited citizens taking a sufficient number of bonds and have them paid back by the tolls from the bridge until it is paid for.

Mr. GARD. The financial campaign seems to be rather hazy so far.

Mr. MACGREGOR. It surely is. We can not very well carry out a campaign for financing it until we have some basis upon which to put it.

Mr. GARD. Has it got so far as to show what would be the estimated cost of the bridge?

Mr. MACGREGOR. The estimated cost is probably about $6,000,000.

Mr. GARD. Then at least half of it would have to be met by the city of Buffalo or the county in which Buffalo is situated.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Some of these men seem to have the idea that they would not have very much difficulty in getting sufficient public-spirited citizens to come across.

Mr. GARD. Does the gentleman think the citizens would contribute as much as $3,000,000 to build the bridge?

Mr. MACGREGOR. That is not very much in our town. A city that can raise $75,000,000 in Liberty bonds in a few weeks ought not to have much trouble in coming across with $3,000,000 for a bridge.

Mr. GARD. Is there anything to be gained in creating this commission except that it is possible that a similar commission may be created by the Canadian Parliament, and that the two sets of men may confer together about the propaganda of erecting a bridge at a certain point? Is that all there is in it?

Mr. MACGREGOR. That is all there is. You are giving moral support to the end that our commission shall be equal to that in standing of the commission to be appointed by the Canadian Parliament.

Mr. GARD. I do not see any great advantage in that; the mayor of Buffalo might appoint a commission——

Mr. MACGREGOR. Does the gentleman think that a commission appointed by the mayor would have any standing with a commission appointed by the Canadian Parliament?

Mr. GARD. I question very much whether any real good, so far as the Government is concerned, can come from the appointment of this commission. If the gentleman thinks it will aid in any way a better understanding of conditions, and there is to be no financial liability on the part of the Government of the United States, I have no objection.

Mr. MACGREGOR. There is no financial liability on the Government, and it certainly would be a great aid to the progress of the movement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a commission be, and hereby is, created to be called the Buffalo public-bridge commission.

SEC. 2. That such commission shall consist of the following-named persons: Frank B. Baird, Edward J. Barcalo, Marcus Barmon, Frederick G. Bagley, Emanuel Boasberg, Col. Charles Clifton, John W. Cowper, William A. Eckert, Louis A. Fischer, Carmelo Gugino, Charles M. Heald, Edward B. Holmes, Allan I. Holloway, Edgar E. Joralemon, Charles B. Kane, Edward Kener, John A. Kloepfer, Stanislaus Lipowicz, Edward P. Lupfer, James H. McNulty, Jacob J. Siegrist, John W. Van Allen, John G. Wickser, Floyd M. Wills, and Frank Winsch.

SEC. 3. That the commission shall inquire into the practicability, feasibility, and estimated expense of the construction of a public bridge from some point in the city of Buffalo, N. Y., over the Niagara River, to some point in the Dominion of Canada, and devise a plan for the construction of such bridge and the manner of financing its construction.

SEC. 4. That the commission is authorized, as a whole or by subcommittees of the commission duly appointed, to hold sittings and public hearings, and to take testimony of experts and others, but without creating any expense or obligations to the United States thereby.

SEC. 5. That said commission may report to Congress its findings and recommendations and submit any testimony taken from time to time, and shall make a final report, accompanied by any testimony not previously submitted, not later than two years after the approval of this act, at which time the term of this commission shall expire, unless it shall have previously made its final report, and in the latter case the term of the commission shall determine with the making of its final report.

SEC. 6. That such commission be, and it hereby is, empowered to adopt rules and regulations for the conduct of the business of the commission.

SEC. 7. That this act shall take effect on the day following its approval.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of section 5 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "The term of said commission shall expire two years after the passage of this act."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I think it may be desirable for Congress to pass a law creating this commission. I can see no reason why they should report to Congress. It is not intended that Congress should have anything to do with it except to grant permission, possibly, to construct the bridge. On the contrary, it may be very embarrassing to them, although that is what they are asking for, to have to report to Congress the manner of financing the construction of the bridge. This section would authorize them to report testimony taken at any time. There is no object in their reporting the testimony to Congress that I can see. There is no object in having the Congress print this report, with all of the maps attached to it, at the expense of the Government, in the end, to give it some official status, upon which somebody soon will perhaps ask that the Government pay for the construction of the bridge. Striking out this section will not in any way interfere with the work of the commission to make all of its investigations, to make its report, and it does not impose any obligation on the Government.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That this act shall take effect on the day following its approval.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out section 7.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Page 3, line 4, strike out all of section 7.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, section 7 provides that the act shall take effect on the day following its approval. It is not necessary. In this particular case it might be dangerous, because, as a matter of fact, most of these small bills under present conditions are not presented personally to the President for his approval, and if this bill should become a law by reason of the President not vetoing it in 10 days, it would not take effect ever, because it would not be approved by the President.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; was read the third time and passed.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the title by striking out from the first line of the title the words "to report to Congress."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment to the title, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the first line of the title, strike out the words "to report to Congress."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. MACGREGOR, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. GALLIVAN, for six days, on account of important business.

To Mr. UPSHAW (at the request of Mr. PARRISH), for five days, on account of illness.

To Mr. VESTAL (at the request of Mr. PURNELL), for four days, on account of important business.

SUSPENSION OF THE RULES.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Are there to be no suspensions of the rules to-day?

The SPEAKER. No.

SUITS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES IN ADMIRALTY.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (S. 3076) authorizing suits against the United States in admiralty, suits for salvage services, and providing for the release of merchant vessels belonging to the United States from arrest and attachment in foreign jurisdictions, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 3076, with Mr. HICKS in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose on Saturday the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] had reserved a point of order to an amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED]. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts desire to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HUSTED: Page 10, lines 10 and 11, after the words "Provided, That," strike out the words "such vessel is employed or intended to be employed in the carriage of cargoes or of passengers for hire," and substitute the following: "in the case of a vessel not employed as a merchant vessel (a) no suit may be brought under this act on causes of action arising since April 6, 1917, and prior to the approval of this act, unless the consent of the Attorney General of the United States is first obtained in writing; and that (b) where an investigation has been held by a department of the Government as to the facts of any such cause of action arising since April 6, 1917, and prior to the approval of this act, and a witness can not be produced upon the trial, his testimony given at the investigation may be offered by the United States and shall be admissible, if such witness was cross-examined at the investigation by the party suing or his attorney; and that (c) no officer or member of the crew of any such vessel may be subpœnaed in connection with any such suit without the consent of the commander of said vessel; and that (d) no suit may be brought under this act by the National or any foreign Government unless it shall be certified by the Secretary of State that said Government under similar circumstances allows nationals of the United States to sue in its courts."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York is not germane, in that this bill and the section to which the amendment is offered is confined to a certain class of Government-owned vessels. In lines 10 and 11, on page 10 of the bill, the proviso is—that such vessel is employed or intended to be employed in the carriage of cargoes or of passengers for hire.

That certainly restricts the application of the act, if it becomes a law, to a certain class of vessels. I submit that this amendment seeks to strike out that language and then provides for what shall be done and how suit may be brought and proceedings had against all Government-owned vessels, and that it is not germane to the purposes and provisions of the bill. It goes far beyond the scope of its provisions. It is a provision which if it were in the bill as originally introduced would probably take the jurisdiction of the bill out of the Committee on the Judiciary. I think it is well recognized that we can not include, by way of amendment in a measure restricted to one particular subject or class, other classes. In other words, you can not, by amendment, broaden the scope of a bill when by the terms of that bill it is restricted to one particular class or subject. I submit that this measure as it has been passed by the Senate and as it has been reported by the Committee on the Judiciary to the House, is restricted in its provisions to merchant vessels employed or intended to be employed in the carriage of cargoes or passengers for hire. Under the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED], it strikes out that proviso and permits suits to be brought because of damage resulting from collisions with naval vessels, or Army transports, or Coast Guard cutters, or Bureau of Fisheries steamers, and vessels under the jurisdiction of the Board of Engineers in the War Department, and opens it to all Government-owned vessels, whether they be employed or intended to be employed in the carriage of cargo and passengers for hire or whether they be employed or intended to be employed strictly on Government business in which they are not competing with any privately owned craft or any individual enterprise.

Now, I think there are several precedents which sustain the contention that I am making. For instance, in the cotton boll-weevil provision in one of the agricultural bills, or in a separate bill—I have forgotten which—they attempted to put in an amendment to cover the gypsy moth. That was ruled out of order. In the case of providing a clerk to one of the committees an amendment was offered to provide a clerk for another committee and it was held not germane. And in the case where they admitted one territory in a bill or resolution an amendment was offered to include another territory and it was excluded on the ground that it was not germane. But where the measure provided for two territories, or three, an amendment offered to include another would have been admissible. But I submit in this instance that by the peculiar, but not the less clear, language used the provisions in this act are restricted—and they are restrictive intentionally—to vessels operating as merchant vessels owned by the Government or by some corporation in which the Government owns stock and which are employed in the carriage of cargo or passengers for hire, or intended to be thus employed.

Now, I submit to the Chair's attention that in 1914, March 25, in the Sixty-third Congress, there was a bill up relating to goods made wholly or in part by convict labor.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman give the reference?

Mr. WALSH. The reference is Sixty-third Congress, second session, page 5481, a decision rendered by Speaker CLARK on March 25, 1914, where, upon a bill relating to the goods made by convict labor or from materials which were made by convict labor, an amendment was offered to include goods made by child labor. And the Speaker ruled that that amendment was not germane.

There is another decision along the same line—on July 16, 1912, Sixty-second Congress, second session, page 9142—which was a bill prohibiting the transportation of messages or information relating to cotton futures. An amendment was offered to include wheat, corn, oats, and other grains, and Speaker CLARK at that time held that that amendment was not germane.

The general rule, Mr. Chairman, is that any amendment which is offered to a section of a bill under consideration must be germane not only to the bill, not only to the section, but to the subject matter under consideration. And I contend that the proposition of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED] is not germane because, as I before stated, it is not related to the subject; it broadens the scope much beyond that covered by the bill, and even the Committee on the Judiciary, I submit, would not be empowered to offer an amendment of that character and scope as a committee amendment without its being subject to a point of order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WALSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Has the gentleman directed his attention to the general purpose of this act, as provided in its title and section 1 of the bill, in connection with his argument?

Mr. WALSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The bill is proposed to be an act authorizing suits against the United States in admiralty, and section 1 provides:

That every vessel owned by the United States, or by any corporation in which the United States or its representatives shall own the entire outstanding capital stock, or in the possession of the United States or of such corporation, or operated by or for the United States or such corporation, is hereby declared to be a public vessel of the United States.

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It seems to me, taking into consideration the fact that section 2 only relates to one specific phase of the general purpose in view, the gentleman's proposition is not good that this bill relates to only one class of merchant vessels.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman stopped too soon in the reading of the title.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In what particular?

Mr. WALSH. He said, "authorizing suits against the United States in admiralty." It also says:

Suits for salvage services, and providing for the release of merchant vessels belonging to the United States from arrest and attachment in foreign jurisdictions, and for other purposes.

Now, it is not limited to just suits in admiralty. It declares immunity and also relates to stipulations as to the release of various public vessels from arrest. But throughout the entire bill, Mr. Chairman, from the first line to the last, the clear intent and purpose is to restrict it to merchant vessels, vessels employed in carrying cargo for hire, or intended to be so employed. There is nothing in here that can be construed to include battleships, submarines, Navy tugs, or any other of the vast number of vessels afloat which are owned by the Government.

And, as I was stating when the gentleman interrupted me, I doubt if the Committee on the Judiciary would be authorized to offer any such amendment as that as a committee amendment, because it takes in vessels that the committee has no jurisdiction over whatever—Navy craft, the Coast Guard, and all these other classes of vessels, the jurisdiction of which is confined to other committees and which are reported upon under different decisions. And I submit the amendment is subject to the point of order.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, may I be heard?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. HUSTED. I submit that the Committee on the Judiciary has just as much jurisdiction over one class of vessels as it has over any other. As a matter of fact, the Committee on the Judiciary has no specific jurisdiction over any class of vessels, but it has jurisdiction over suits in admiralty. The gentleman from Massachusetts has cited a number of precedents, but every one of them refers to cases where new matter has been brought into the bill by way of amendment, and that is not this case at all. This is a very interesting point of order, because it runs counter to two rulings.

There is one ruling of the House that you can not bring in new matter which will change the character of the subject of the bill. That is, you can not by bringing in new matter make a specific subject a general subject. Now, there is another ruling that you can strike anything out of any part of the bill, and that is the ruling upon which I rest my case. In order to understand the rule relating to germaneness it is necessary to understand the reason behind the rule, and that reason, as has been stated over and over again, is to protect the Members of the House against surprise; to protect them against the situation where a subject entirely foreign to the bill is brought in by way of amendment. But the Members have the text of the bill before them, and they must be presumed to anticipate the elimination by amendment of any part or any portion of the text. They can not be said to be taken by surprise if a portion of the text is stricken out, because they have the text before them. And even if striking out a portion of the text changes the character of the subject from specific to general it does not offend the rule.

Now, that is in conformity with the spirit of the rule; it is also in conformity with the language of the rule itself, because the rule reads:

> And no motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment.

And it is also in conformity with the precedents. I would refer to Hinds' Precedents, Volume V, page 410, section 5805, as follows:

> Mr. Charles E. Littlefield, of Maine, moved to strike out the words "in United States cases."
> Mr. James A. Hemenway, of Indiana, made the point of order that the amendment would change law and would not be germane. He stated that the effect of the amendment would be to pay for meals and lodgings of jurors in civil cases.
> It appeared from the debate that there was no general law providing for meals and lodgings of jurors in any cases.
> The Chairman held:
> "The Chair would call attention to the fact that on Monday a similar question arose here in which the rules and decisions were referred to. A precedent seems to have been established in the Committee of the Whole that where a paragraph which changes existing law has been by general consent allowed to remain it may be perfected by any germane amendment.
> "If that rule is to be followed, this amendment is in order, and the Chair overrules the point of order. The Chair also thinks the rule to be that an amendment striking out a portion of a paragraph is not subject to a point of order. Form and not effect should be considered. Germaneness refers to words added rather than to those taken away."

I also cite a precedent established by Mr. Speaker CLARK in the Sixty-second Congress, House Manual and Digest, page 348.

The CHAIRMAN. Page or paragraph?

Mr. HUSTED. Page 348, paragraph 782. There Mr. Speaker CLARK said:

> The proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is really to strike out. That is always in order—to strike anything out of anything.

Now, my amendment strikes a proviso out of the bill, and if any portion of my amendment offends, that is the only portion which offends, because that is the only portion which can be held to change a specific into a general subject. The rest of the amendment is mere limitation, which does not affect or change the character of the subject in any respect whatever.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HUSTED. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESS. In the food-control legislation, as the gentleman will recall, the entire character of the law was changed by an amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], by striking out certain words which changed the law from a matter of regulation to a matter of prohibition, and it was declared in order. It changed the character of the law entirely.

Mr. HUSTED. I am very glad the gentleman from Ohio cites that precedent. I remember it, and it is a precedent directly in point. It is a precedent which should be controlling in this case.

This amendment simply strikes this provision from the bill, and I fail to find a single precedent for the proposition that an amendment which simply strikes a provision from the bill, however it changes the character of the bill, is offensive to the rule of germaneness.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUSTED. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman permit the Chair to ask the gentleman from Ohio for a citation of the reference he has made?

Mr. FESS. It was section 9 of the food-control act, introduced by Mr. Lever, striking out certain words in section 9 and changing the words from the regulation of certain grains used in the manufacture of liquor to the prohibition of them. I shall have to get the RECORD in order to furnish the exact facts.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to cite to the gentleman a precedent upon the proposition which he last stated, namely, that it is always in order to strike out. On page 398, the fourth volume of Hinds' Precedents, paragraph 3596, they had under discussion a provision to enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to investigate in regard to the use and necessity of block-signal systems and plans for the automatic control of railroad trains, including experimental tests, and so forth. A motion was made to strike out the word "automatic." The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] made the point of order that it was not in order to strike that out, as it would widen the scope of the amendment to the law; and it was held that if a motion to strike out certain words in a paragraph or an appropriation in a general appropriation bill would change the object from one authorized by existing law to one not so authorized, the motion is not in order. While that was confined to a general appropriation bill, the principle here is just the same. If by striking out something you widen and broaden the scope and seek to change the law in a respect not within the purview of the act, the motion to strike out is certainly subject to a point of order.

There is another precedent that I have not been able to find, although I have a reference to it in the first volume of Hinds' Precedents—a ruling that it was not in order to strike out the word "not," because it changes the entire scope and character of the bill. But I am not able to put my hands on that at this time.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUSTED. Yes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The Chair inquired a moment ago of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] as to when the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] offered his amendment to the Lever Act. It was on the 23d day of June, 1917.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, I have not seen the precedent cited by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], but that came up apparently in the consideration of a general appropriation bill, and the Chairman probably held the amendment out of order on the ground that it created new legislation, which was out of order in a general appropriation bill; and if that is so, then it would seem that the case cited by the gentleman from Massachusetts, while an adroit suggestion, is not pertinent in connection with the consideration of this point of order.

It seems to me that the whole trend of authority is to the effect that where you strike matter out of a bill, where you simply change the text of legislation which is before you, you have no right thereby to claim that you have been surprised, and the whole reason behind the rule is to protect a Member against surprise. No Member can claim that he is surprised if some words are stricken out of a bill, because he must be held to have within reasonable contemplation the possibility that words will be stricken out, and he is to be assumed to know what the effect of the striking out of those words will be.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I shall take part in this discussion. I certainly would not but for the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED] that the motion to strike out words is always in order.

Now, I will give an illustration which I am sure the gentleman from New York will say proves that a motion to strike out is not always in order. Take, for instance, the Philippine tariff law. We had the right to fix the rates of duty on goods coming from the Philippines into the United States. We had the right to say that they should come in free from the Philippines. That would be a bill relating wholly to the question of tariff between the United States and the Philippine Islands, a possession of the United States. As I recall—and I do not give the reference—when that bill was up for consideration some one moved to strike out the language that would confine it to the Philippine Islands. If it had said "goods coming from the Philippines, imported into the United States from the Philippines," all that was necessary to do was to strike out the words "coming from the Philippines," and that would have made it a universal tariff bill.

Now, it is perfectly patent that the striking out of that language was not a germane amendment. It had no relation to the subject matter, because it was intended to change the subject matter wholly from a tariff with the Philippine Islands to a universal tariff law, and it was held to be out of order.

The same thing was true when the Canadian reciprocity bill was before the House. I can not cite the reference; I do not know whether it is carried in the RECORD even, because some one who looked it up told me that while the decision was made there was some error in recording, so that it did not appear in the RECORD. I do not know as to that.

But a motion was made to strike out the language which would confine the provision for reciprocity to Canada. That would have made it universal and would have destroyed wholly the purpose of the bill in the first instance, which was designed to operate with Canada only, and would have made it a universal reciprocity proposition. It was held there that the motion to strike out was out of order. I think it is the general rule that where words of limitation are in a bill, limiting the subject matter of the bill, and it is proposed to strike out those words, so as to change the subject matter of the bill and enlarge its scope, such an amendment is held not germane, because it is not germane to that bill but would be germane to a bill involving the whole subject matter. Now, a Member introducing a bill has the right to introduce it in relation to a particular proposition. There are many adjectives of definition constantly used in public bills and private bills which, if you should strike them out, would make the bills universal in character and entirely change their scope. I hope the Chair will not express the opinion in ruling that it necessarily follows that a motion to strike out is in order because of the general principle that it is within the power of the House to strike out any language in a bill. It is generally true that a parliamentary body can strike out any proposition in a bill, but under the question of germaneness an amendment is not permissible which by striking out language would change the purpose and scope of the bill.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. I should like to have the gentleman's opinion on the point specifically raised here a moment ago, where a provision in the bill is limited to regulation and you strike out the limitation, which will amount to entire prohibiton; would that be in order?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I hope I do not rush too often in expressing opinions. I never read that bill. I was not here when it was under consideration. I have never read the proceedings. I do not know anything at all about it except the gentleman's statement, and that is not sufficiently explicit to afford me an opinion on the subject.

Mr. FESS. I appreciate the strength of the argument made by the gentleman a moment ago, but it seems to me the last ruling that I referred to is precisely on that point.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not know whether there was any ruling.

Mr. FESS. Yes; there was a ruling.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If the gentleman will pardon me, I will say this: The temperance question is not the best question in this House on which to get a parliamentary ruling. [Laughter.]

Mr. FESS. There were three amendments offered to that bill, proposing to change regulation to prohibition, and against them the point of order was sustained. Then a fourth amendment was offered proposing to accomplish the same result by striking out words, and the point of order against that amendment was overruled.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, it has been well said that this is an interesting question, and, of course, it reaches beyond the immediate case that we have before the House. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED] said, I presume somewhat inadvertently, that the rule provided that a motion to strike out was always in order. I will say to the gentleman that there is no such provision of the rule.

Mr. HUSTED. If the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. HUSTED. The gentleman from New York was not aware that he had claimed that the rule so provided. The gentleman from New York referred to a ruling, not to a rule of the House.

Mr. TOWNER. That is sufficient. The gentleman, of course, now states it correctly, that the ruling related to the particular decision that he quoted. The gentleman, of course, is well acquainted with the fact that in the consideration of these precedents we must remember that the Speaker or the Chairman at the time he made a ruling had in mind only the particular subject then under consideration, and when a Chairman said that it was always in order to move to strike out that did not mean that it is of universal application. He had in mind only the particular case before him.

Now, it certainly must be true that if by striking out a word which is necessarily a word of limitation the scope of the bill would be enlarged, because if the limitation is taken from the bill other matters are brought within the provisions of the bill which by the limiting words were excluded, and such an amendment is not germane to the bill proposing the limited legislation. As a matter of fact, in this case the legislation is predicated upon that very sort of a limitation, so that the effect of striking out the word of limitation would enlarge the scope of the bill and make it subject to objections that have always been held good for want of germaneness. In such cases it is beyond the contemplation of the legislation, and if so beyond the right of amendment. Now, here we have a bill which allows the United States to be sued because it is operating merchant vessels. What is the reason of that? Not generally that the United States can be sued, or that all of its vessels may be libeled, or that everything carried in a man-of-war may be held up pending a suit against the vessel. That was never in contemplation. It was only contemplated that because the United States was operating merchant vessels, the same as merchantmen were operating merchant vessels, it ought to be subject to the same rules as those which apply to merchant vessels.

But here comes in an amendment which, by striking out the word "merchant" or the equivalent, says that all of the vessels owned by the United States shall be subject to these same liabilities, or that the United States may in all such cases be sued, not only with regard to merchant vessels but with regard to war vessels operated by the Navy Department or the transports operated by the War Department or vessels operated by the Coast Guard or the Lighthouse Service or the Revenue-Cutter Service, under the Treasury Department. By striking out the word "merchant" or its equivalent all these vessels are made subject to the provisions of the bill. It certainly seems that it should not require any argument to show that such a thing as that would be going way beyond the right of amendment, which must be limited not by the decision of any Speaker or Chairman, but by the very language of the rule itself, which provides that no motion, whether it strikes out or whether it adds to a proposition, on a subject different from that under consideraton shall be admitted under color of amendment.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that you could not have a better example than this to bring it within the rule. Let me call your attention, if I may, to one decision in the fifth volume of Hinds' Precedents, section 5842, where it is held that to a bill relating to corporations engaged in interstate commerce an amendment relating to all corporations was not germane.

See how applicable that case is to the present case. To a bill here limiting the application of the bill to merchant vessels operated by the United States the effect of this amendment would be to enlarge it to all vessels operated by the United States. I think I have a right to claim that that case is directly in principle applicable to this case. I need not cite the numerous decisions that have been made in which it was held that you could not add to one class others even of the same class.

In the case under consideration here is a class of merchant vessels, and, while they may be numerous, they are of the same individual class, and to add other classes, either by striking out or adding to, would be in direct violation of the rule which says that this can not be done.

It occurs to me, Mr. Chairman, that it would be certainly most unfortunate if, when words of limitation are contained in a bill which limit its application to a particular subject, it should be held that by striking out the words of limitation you might make it of universal application. That would be going clear beyond the rights that are reserved to the membership of the House in knowing and anticipating what may be brought before them for consideration.

The gentleman from New York makes a very strong statement in regard to his case, and of course if consideration should be limited to the language of these two or three precedents that he cites, which says that you always have a right to strike out, then the gentleman's case is made. But, on principle and with the additional precedents, I think the Chair would not be justified in holding that his amendment was germane.

Mr. HUSTED. If the Chair will indulge me, it is always difficult to contend against the eminent gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the eminent gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] in an argument on the point of order. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the gentleman from Illinois was discussing this proposition in general terms, and did not address himself to the particular point under consideration.

I would like to say further, with all due deference to the ability and experience of the gentleman from Iowa, that I think his statements are somewhat at fault. Originally under the earlier precedents the question of germaneness was confined to the subject of the bill itself. Later on it was extended to the section and then to the paragraph under consideration. But it has never, so far as I know, been extended to the phrase or to the line or to the word under consideration, because if you extended it to that extent you could not amend a bill in any respect whatever. You could reduce the proposition to an absurdity.

Now, my amendment merely strikes out a limitation contained in a proviso. It has not the character of amendment at all that the gentleman from Illinois cited to the House. His was an amendment which changed the whole structure and character of the legislation, like the amendment that he suggested to the Philippine tariff bill. But this is an amendment which merely strikes out a limitation contained in a proviso, in a bill relating to suits in admiralty. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that section 2 of the Senate bill makes no reference whatever to merchant vessels. Section 2 of the Senate bill does not limit the causes of action, as I understand it, to merchant vessels. So I contend, Mr. Chairman, that the citation of precedents which I have made are applicable to the situation before the House and should guide and determine the Chairman in deciding the question.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair hear me for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. TILSON. The soundness of the position taken by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] and also by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that a motion to strike out is not always in order can not be questioned, it seems to me, as a general proposition. The very language of the rule itself would seem to imply as much. It says "and no motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment."

What was the use of the word "motion" if we limit it simply to an amendment to add new matter? The word "proposition" would cover that. The very fact that the word "motion" is used would seem to me of itself to justify a construction that would forbid, under certain conditions, striking out as well as adding. If the necessary effect of a motion to strike out is to introduce a new subject, then the rule applies forbidding it.

The question seems to me to be whether a new subject has been added by the motion of the gentleman from New York to amend, and the thing for the Chairman to determine is whether, as a matter of fact, a new subject has been added. The rule is emphatic that no new subject shall be added under guise of an amendment. Has a new subject been added here?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Adverting to the precedent cited by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], is it not a fact that in striking out there no new subject was brought in? It just changed a regulation to a direct prohibition by law, but it was still the same subject.

Mr. TILSON. It made the regulation very much more stringent.

Mr. WALSH. But still operating upon the same subject matter.

Mr. TILSON. One question here is whether or not the first paragraph of this bill is not so broad in its terms that it would include other vessels besides strictly merchant vessels.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. There is no legislation as to that except what follows in the subsequent sections.

Mr. TILSON. I have not gone into the bill in such detail as to know how much further the broad scope of the first section has been carried, but certainly the first section is very much broader than merchant vessels. My point is that the question here to be decided is not whether it is permitted under the rules to strike anything out of a bill or not but whether a new subject has been introduced under color of an amendment, whether to strike out or to add or both.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the gentleman's amendment, but it seems to me it is in order. I think there is a misunderstanding on the part of the committee in respect to the scope of the bill as it passed the Senate. Section 2 of the bill as it passed the Senate contained no restriction whatever upon the kind of vessel. It refers to any vessel owned by the United States or by any corporation. It provides that proceedings in rem shall not be brought, but that proceedings in personam may be brought and treated as actions in rem, and that is all that is done by section 2 of the bill as reported by the House committee. By striking out the proviso the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED] does not extend the bill beyond the scope of section 2 as passed by the Senate, nor does he extend it beyond the scope of the bill according to the definition in section 1 of the bill as reported by the House committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair recognizes that this point is somewhat involved and complicated and that it raises some new questions. The Chair has been consulting some of the references, not only those mentioned by gentlemen who have debated the point of order but some he has been able to find independent of the argument. In passing, let the Chair remark that he has but one desire, and that is to interpret the rules impartially and invoke the precedents without prejudice. The Chair fortunately is not called upon to express his own opinion upon the merits of the subject presented. The gentleman from New York in arguing to sustain his amendment bases it, as the Chair understands, largely upon the fact that striking out any words in a bill is in order, irrespective of what that effect will be. The Chair is aware that Mr. Speaker CLARK some years ago made a ruling of that kind, that a motion to strike out "is always in order—to strike anything out of anything," and that since then, in a general way, we have followed that ruling.

The present occupant of the chair, however, without the slightest desire to take exception to the ruling of the former Speaker, believes that that ruling is at times subject to qualification and modification, and should properly be interpreted in reference to the subject matter affected.

The Chair for the moment will pass that point, however, and will consider the point of order from another angle.

A motion to strike out and insert is indivisible—paragraph 7, Rule XVI—and the amendment of the gentleman from New York not only strikes out certain words in the bill but inserts certain other words. It seems to the Chair that we should analyze those words which the amendment proposes for incorporation in the bill in conjunction with those that are to be stricken out. If we refer to the words to be inserted we find that while they are limitations to a certain extent, they refer directly to a specific class of vessels. The Chair will quote one sentence of the amendment to fortify his position:

In the case of a vessel not employed as a merchant vessel.

What is that class of vessels? They are the military ships of the United States and vessels engaged in the public service of the United States. The subject matter of the bill, as the Chair understands its provisions, pertains solely to one class of ships, and what is that class? They are the ships engaged in merchant service, publicly owned though they be. Therefore it seems to the Chair that as the motion to strike out and insert can not be divided we have in the words to be added a subject which is not so related to the subject matter of the bill as to come within the rule for germaneness.

To complete the record on the point of germaneness, the Chair cites paragraph 7, Rule XVI, with which we are all familiar, "that no motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment," and to cite the same rule further, "One individual proposition may not be amended by another individual proposition, even though the two belong to the same class." There are so many noted precedents that have been established under this rule that the Chair does not think it necessary to refer to them. The Chair feels that the word "proposition" in paragraph 7 may be considered as providing for a situation in which a motion to strike out, while it does not in positive language add a new subject, does in effect widen the scope of the bill beyond that contemplated if we adhere too strictly to the theory "that it is always in order to strike anything out of anything." As a counter proposition to this—and the Chair feels that both are rather general in their application—the Chair refers to Hinds' Precedents, Volume V, section 5834, where, on a motion to recommit, it was held "that it is not in order to do indirectly by a motion what may not be done directly by way of amendment." The gentleman from New York in his able argument in support of his contention refers to Hinds' Precedents, Volume V, section 5805, "where an amendment simply striking out words already in a bill" was held to be germane. The gentleman from New York will note that the Chair in making that ruling was evidently not entirely sure of his ground, for he says "that this question is rather a question for the committee to decide; a question of policy rather than a question for the Chair to decide on a point of order."

This brings us to a consideration of the thought suggested by Mr. MANN of Illinois, Mr. WALSH, and Mr. TOWNER of a single motion to strike out, if by so doing the scope of the bill would thereby be enlarged. The point of striking out certain words was the crux of the argument of the gentleman from New York, and the Chair will now consider the principle involved.

The points made in this feature of the discussion have opened up very broad and in some respects comparatively undetermined questions, which, since they have been brought forward, the Chair feels obliged to pass upon.

The Chair realizes that the presiding officer is not called upon to determine the effect of an amendment upon the law itself or to interpret legislative propositions. In the precedents that have been cited conflict of rulings appear, and the Chair thinks that when those conflicts arise it is the duty of the Chair to apply the rule of reason, and the Chair will endeavor to apply that in the present instance. The Chair desires to cite from a precedent and read the opinion of the presiding officer at that time, which has not been referred to by gentlemen who have spoken to the point of order. It seems to the Chair that this precedent is almost a parallel case to the point of order now being discussed. The Chair reads from Hinds' Precedents, Volume V, paragraph 5864. This was on December 16, 1898. The House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, considering the bill to extend the laws relating to customs and internal revenue over the Hawaiian Islands, and the first section of the bill having been read—and here is the point that the Chair especially wants to have emphasized—

Be it enacted, etc., That the laws of the United States relating to customs and internal revenue, including those relating to the punishment of crimes in connection with the enforcement of said laws, are hereby extended to and over the Island of Hawaii and all adjacent islands and waters of the islands.

After that had been read Mr. McRae, of Arkansas, offered an amendment to strike out, after the words "the United States," the following: "relating to customs and internal revenue." Mr. Dingley, of Maine, made the point of order that the amendment was not germane, and after debate upon the subject the Chairman held as follows:

The Chair thinks that the point of order is well taken. This bill is to extend the laws relating to customs and internal revenue, and the amendment seeks to open up the question of land titles and other laws in the Territories, thus enlarging the scope and bringing in matter not germane to the bill.

The point of order was sustained.

In Hinds' Precedents, Volume IV, section 3596, is another case in point, which the Chair will cite. An amendment was offered which contained, among others, these words, "appliances for the automatic control of railway trains." Mr. Crumpacker, of Indiana, moved to strike out the word "automatic." Mr. MANN of Illinois made a point of order, and the Chair in ruling upon it said:

I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana whether or not his description, by striking out the word "automatic" here, would not let in a great many things? That is, would not the scope of the investigation be much wider and more extended than if the term "automatic" is included?

The ensuing debate having indicated that the effect of the amendment might be to extend the scope of the investigation, the Chair sustained the point of order, though evidently in some doubt.

The Chair feels that notwithstanding the general proposition that parliamentary questions are usually determined by the form and not the effect of an amendment, that when no rules are applicable the effect should be taken into consideration as a determining factor, when by striking out specific words new and different subjects are thereby introduced, and the scope of the legislation under consideration is broadened beyond that contemplated in the bill.

In line with what the Chair considers the most conclusive precedents in reference to striking out words, following also the precedents pertaining to germaneness, and in conformity with the views just expressed by the Chair on the subject of scope of legislation, the Chair feels that the point of order is well taken, and sustains it.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VOLSTEAD: Page 10, line 8, after the word "maintained," insert the following: "at the time of the commencement of the action herein provided for."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota desire to discuss the amendment?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No. It is to correct a clerical omission.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VOLSTEAD: Page 11, lines 1 to 4, strike out the colon after the word "party," in line 1, and insert a period. Strike out the rest of the section and insert in place thereof the following sentence: "Upon application of either party the cause may, in the discretion of the court, be transferred to any other district court of the United States."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. That is to correct the language and make a slight modification, but I think it will carry out the general purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That such suits shall proceed and shall be heard and determined according to the principles of law and to the rules of practice obtaining in like cases between private parties. A decree against the United States or such corporation may include costs of suit, and when the decree is for a money judgment, interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum until satisfied, or at any higher rate which shall be stipulated in any contract upon which such decree shall be based. Interest shall run as ordered by the court. Decrees shall be subject to appeal and revision as now provided in other cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. If the libelant so elects in his libel, the suit may proceed in accordance with the principles of libels in rem wherever it shall appear that had the vessel or cargo been privately owned and possessed a libel in rem might have been maintained. Election so to proceed shall not preclude the libelant in any proper case from seeking relief in personam in the same suit. Neither the United States nor such corporation shall be required to give any bond or admiralty stipulation on any proceeding brought hereunder.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VOLSTEAD: Insert at the end of section 3, page 11, line 25, the following: "Any such bond or stipulation heretofore given in admiralty causes by the United States, the United States Shipping Board, or the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation shall become void and be surrendered and duly canceled on the filing of a suggestion by the Attorney General or other duly authorized law officer that the United States is interested in such cause and assumes liability to satisfy any decree included within said bond, and thereafter any such decree shall be paid as provided in section 8 of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota desire to be heard on his amendment?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Just for a second. The attorney for the Shipping Board submitted this to me two or three days ago. They have $2,000,000 of funds belonging to the Fleet Corporation, put up as security in various cases. If this provision can be added, then that money can be released and used. It would seem as though the Government is ample security for anything it may have to pay in these suits and that the money ought not to be tied up.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I will.

Mr. WALSH. Does this cancel and annul these bonds?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes; it does.

Mr. WALSH. Suppose the party does not want to carry any bonds; does not want to take the stipulation?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. We have the right, anyway, I presume, because the Government is not bound by the constitutional provision against impairments of contracts. I do not think anyone will object, because there is an express provision in this bill that as soon as a judgment has been obtained it shall be certified and paid. Parties can not suffer by reason of this provision, as it seems to me, in view of that we are making provision for prompt payment, it will save expense and give us the use of this money during the time that these suits may be pending. They may drag along perhaps for years. There is no good reason why that money ought to be tied up, since we are amply responsible.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I will.

Mr. TILSON. Has the gentleman ever attempted to get a claim paid by the Government to any private individual?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I know it is usually difficult, but there is an express provision in this bill as to how claims shall be paid. The money is provided for, and it is directed that upon judgment being entered it shall be paid at once. So we have provided a remedy.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman knows that delays on the part of the Government in paying its just debts often amounts to a denial of justice?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I realize that.

Mr. WHALEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I will.

Mr. WHALEY. Is it the intention to cover by this amendment the bonds given in foreign countries?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No. In foreign countries it would be different.

Mr. WHALEY. As the amendment reads here it would cover those cases, because it says upon the suggestion of the Attorney General they shall become void.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. That would not make them void in foreign countries, because our laws do not extend to foreign countries. It could only cover our own citizens in this country, and possibly it might cover citizens, if we had any, in foreign countries that had claims.

Mr. WHALEY. It is intended only to apply in our own courts?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. In our own courts.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That if a privately owned vessel not in the possession of the United States or of such corporation is arrested or attached upon any cause of action arising or alleged to have arisen out of the previous possession, ownership, or operation of such vessel by the United States or by such corporation, such vessel shall be released without bond or stipulation therefor upon the suggestion by the United States, through its Attorney General or other duly authorized law officer, that it is interested in such cause, desires such release, and assumes the liability for the satisfaction of any decree obtained by the libelant in such cause, and thereafter such cause shall proceed against the United States in accordance with the provisions of this act.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

This section 4 is the one that relates to vessels which have previously been operated by the United States and have since passed into private ownership. Do I understand that it is the intention now, if suit is to be brought within two years after a collision occurs for damages which resulted while the vessel was being operated by the United States, but after she is returned to private ownership, that the United States steps in and furnishes this stipulation and assumes the liability for the satisfaction of the decree and releases her from arrest, and so forth, just as if the United States still owned the vessel?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It is my understanding, and I presume that would save some money, instead of having the vessel tied up, with the costs incident thereto. I do not see any great necessity——

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HUSTED. The United States, it seems to me, would be in exactly the same situation as to causes of action which arose after the United States Government parted with the possession of the ships as she would be in reference to causes of action that arose while she was in possession of the ships.

We have provided by the bill that, as to causes of action arising while the United States owns and is in possession of the ship, we dispense with the giving of any bond. The vessels are declared to be immune from arrest and seizure and from all process in the admiralty courts. But this is to cover the case of a vessel that was in collision, perhaps, while in the ownership and possession of the Government, but where no suit was started, and then she is sold to private owners and the Government is subsequently sued; and the vessel, not now being under the ownership and possession of the Government, therefore she would be liable as a private vessel and subject to arrest and seizure, just exactly as any other private vessel when sued. Where the United States is concerned, we provide here, by the suggestion of the Attorney General, that the Government will assume responsibility; that this bond may be done away with; that the bond which the Government of the United States might otherwise be subject to will be dispensed with.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUSTED. Yes.

Mr. IGOE. Do I understand the chairman of the committee to state to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] that this would cover cases of collisions or torts occurring after the United States had sold the vessel?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No; of injuries occurring prior to the sale.

Mr. IGOE. I think it should be understood that it is limited to these cases.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It is limited to this; the Government is not compelled to step in.

Mr. IGOE. The gentleman also gave an answer to one of the Members that indicated that it was to cover cases of vessels which the United States had sold and on which they held some sort of lien.

Mr. WALSH. My question was inspired by the phraseology in line 4, "to have arisen out of the previous possession, ownership, or operations." Should not those words "out of" be eliminated and the word "during" inserted in their place? This says "to have arisen out of previous possession, ownership, or operation of such vessel." I do not know just what that means. The chairman of the committee thinks that language is all right. I would like the chairman to tell me what it means. What does it mean, "to have arisen out of previous possession, ownership, or operation of such vessel"?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Because of an action arising out of its ownership, possession, or operation. The word "previous" indicates the time.

Mr. WALSH. How could a cause of action arise out of its possession?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. During its possession it may have been in a collision.

Mr. TILSON. The word "out" bothers the gentleman. It may be outside.

Mr. WHALEY. It means during the operation by the United States of the vessel.

Mr. WALSH. I know, but the word "during" will apply to all three, during the previous possession, during the ownership, and during the operation. It would fit with those three words, it seems to me.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. That would not confine it to the ship as the result of the Government's ownership or possession of the ship.

Mr. WALSH. "During the previous ownership or possession by the United States?"

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No.

Mr. WALSH. "To have arisen during the previous possession of such vessel by the United States."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Out of what?

Mr. WALSH. Arisen during the previous possession.

Mr. GARD Mr Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr WALSH Yes; I will yield to anybody who can tell me just what this means. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will have to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to get unanimous consent for an extension of time, because the gentleman's time is up.

Mr. WALSH. At the time I spoke I had not been notified. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARD. I want to ask the chairman of the committee whether he, with the assistance of the 21 other sturdy legislators here present, intends to finish the bill to-night?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. We would like to finish it to-night. There are only three or four pages left. I do not think it would take long to complete it. Other business will probably come up to-morrow.

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman will tell me what this language means I will stop right now. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARD. I certainly could not tell the gentleman more than has been told him by the chairman of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts withdraws his pro forma amendment?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; and then I offer the following amendment: After the word "arisen," in line 4, page 12, insert the words "during or," so that it will read "to have arisen during or out of the previous possession, ownership, or operation of such vessel."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Page 12, line 4, after the word "arisen," insert the words "during or."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts desire to be heard on the amendment?

Mr. WALSH. Just briefly. It seems to me this would clarify the intent somewhat and would not be any obstacle at all to the interpretation or the administration of the act as set forth in this language.

Mr. WHALEY. Mr. Chairman, why not strike out "out of" and insert "during"?

Mr. WALSH. The chairman of the committee objected to that.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. If you simply say "during the previous possession" you do not say what it has arisen from.

Mr. WHALEY. The cause of action has arisen during the previous possession.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No; from the possession, occupation, or use of the ship.

Mr. WALSH. Does "out of" mean "from"?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Then why not strike out the words "out of" and insert the word "from"?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. That will do; I will not object to that.

Mr. WALSH. I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment so as to strike out the words "out of" and insert the word "from."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARD. Let it be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Page 12, line 4, after the word "arising," strike out the words "out of" and insert in lieu thereof the word "from."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That suits as herein authorized may be brought on causes of action arising since June 6, 1917, provided that suits based on causes of action arising prior to the approval of this act shall be brought within one year after the approval of this act; and all other suits hereunder shall be brought within two years after the cause of action arises.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VOLSTEAD: Page 12, line 15, strike out "June" and insert in lieu thereof "April."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. That is simply to correct a clerical mistake. The committee directed me to insert "April 6, 1917." The intention was to have it commence from the date when war was declared.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That if any vessel or cargo within the purview of sections 1 and 4 of this act is arrested, attached, or otherwise seized by process of any court in any country other than the United States, or if any suit is brought therein against the master of any such vessel for any cause of action arising out of, or in connection with, the possession, operation, or ownership of any such vessel, or the possession, carriage, or ownership of any such cargo, the Secretary of State of the United States in his discretion, upon the request of the Attorney General of the United States, or any other officer duly authorized by him, may direct the United States consul residing at or nearest the place at which such action may have been commenced to execute an agreement, undertaking, bond, or stipulation for and on behalf of the United States, or the United States Shipping Board, or such corporation as by said court required, for the release of such vessel or cargo, and for the prosecution of any appeal; or may, in the event of such suits against the master of any such vessel, direct said United States consul to enter the appearance of the United States, or of the United States Shipping Board, or of such corporation, and to pledge the credit thereof to the payment of any judgment and cost that may be entered in such suit. The Attorney General is hereby vested with power and authority to arrange with any bank, surety company, person, firm, or corporation in the United States, its Territories and possessions, or in any foreign country, to execute any such aforesaid bond or stipulation as surety or stipulator thereon, and to pledge the credit of the United States to the indemnification of such surety or stipulator as may be required to secure the execution of such bond or stipulation. The presentation of a copy of the judgment roll in any such suit, certified by the clerk of the court and authenticated by the certificate and seal of the United States consul claiming such vessel or cargo, or his successor, and by the certificate of the Secretary of State as to the official capacity of such consul, shall be sufficient evidence to the proper accounting officers of the United States, or of the United States Shipping Board, or of such corporation, for the allowance and payment of such judgments: Provided, however, That nothing in this section shall be held to prejudice or preclude a claim of the immunity of such vessel or cargo from foreign jurisdiction.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. VOLSTEAD: Page 13, line 11, after the word "commenced," insert the following: "to claim such vessel or cargo as immune from such arrest, attachment, or other seizure, and."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard on his amendment?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No; I do not think it is necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. On page 13, line 4, after the word "arising," I move to strike out the words "out of" and insert the word "from."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Page 13, line 4, after the word "arising," strike out the words "out of" and insert the word "from."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That the Secretary of any department of the Government of the United States, or the United States Shipping Board, or the board of trustees of such corporation, having control or the possession or operation of any merchant vessel are, and each hereby is, authorized to arbitrate, compromise, or settle any claim in which suit will lie under the provisions of sections 1, 4, 7, and 10 of this act.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, in line 9, page 15, I move to strike out the figure "1" and to substitute the figure "2."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Amendment offered by Mr. VOLSTEAD: Page 15, line 9, strike out the figure "1" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "2."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That all moneys recovered in any suit brought by the United States on any cause of action arising out of or in connection with the possession, operation, or ownership of any merchant vessel, or the possession, carriage, or ownership of any cargo, shall be covered into the United States Treasury to the credit of the department of the Government of the United States, or of the United States Shipping Board, or of such aforesaid corporation, having control of the vessel or cargo with respect to which such cause of action arises, for reimbursement of the appropriation, or insurance fund, or other funds, from which the loss, damage, or compensation for which said judgment was recovered has been or will be paid.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, on page 15, line 22, after the word "arising," I move to strike out the words "out of" and insert in lieu thereof the word "from."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Page 15, line 22, after the word "arising," strike out the words "out of" and insert in lieu thereof the word "from."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. That the Attorney General shall report to the Congress at each session thereof the suits under this act in which final judgment shall have been rendered for or against the United States and such aforesaid corporation, and the Secretary of any department of the Government of the United States, and the United States Shipping Board, and the board of trustees of any such aforesaid corporation, shall likewise report the arbitration awards or settlements of claims which shall have been agreed to since the previous session, and in which the time to appeal shall have expired or have been waived.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Should not the word "judgments" be included in line 16, or is that covered in the other part of the section?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. That is covered in line 11 of that section.

Mr. WALSH. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

On motion of Mr. VOLSTEAD, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HICKS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill (S. 3076) authorizing suits against the United States in admiralty, suits for salvage services, and providing for the release of merchant vessels belonging to the United States from arrest and attachment in foreign jurisdictions, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put the amendments in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to a third reading.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the proceedings in the House be vacated, and that the House again resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill. Before the committee rose we did not strike out the Senate bill and insert the House amendment that we had been considering.

Mr. GARD. Does the gentleman ask that that be done by unanimous consent?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I ask unanimous consent that the proceedings in the House be vacated.

Mr. GARD. It will be necessary to obtain unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. It will have to be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I ask unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request to vacate the proceedings in the House?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. HICKS in the chair.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move that all after the enacting clause in the Senate bill be stricken out and the provision as reported by the House Committee on the Judiciary and agreed to in the committee be substituted as the bill.

Mr. GARD. A parliamentary inquiry. If the motion to strike out the Senate bill is carried, do you propose to go over each item of the House amendments? The ordinary course would be to strike out the Senate bill and proceed to consider the House bill.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. We did not do it in that way.

Mr. GARD. And not having done it in that way, are you going over it again?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No.

Mr. GARD. I do not understand the procedure.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. We have agreed to an amendment striking out all of the Senate bill after the enacting clause.

Mr. IGOE. It is simply a sloppy way of doing business.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Exactly.

Mr. WALSH. We got permission on Saturday, by unanimous consent, to suspend or dispense with the reading of the Senate bill, and, although the chairman asked that the House amendment be considered in committee as an original bill, the request stated by the Chair was that the amendment reported by the Judiciary Committee be read and subject to amendment as an original bill. We did not consider the Senate bill in the Committee of the Whole, and it seems to me that it is necessary that we agree to the amendment referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that there was much confusion Saturday, and the Chair stated the proposition as stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts. Perhaps the Chair was taking something on himself in stating it that way, but it seemed as though that was the clearest way to handle the proposition, and he still thinks the way suggested Saturday and the way passed upon is the best way to handle the question.

Mr. WALSH. If the Chair will permit, it requires an independent action on the committee amendment. We have taken some action here now to agree to the amendment reported by the Judiciary Committee. When we get unanimous consent to consider that in Committee of the Whole and reading of the Senate bill is dispensed with, the Senate bill goes into the discard.

Mr. IGOE. What we have done is to consider it as a separate amendment. We have amended it, but the amendment reported by the committee is now one amendment.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IGOE. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Did we not consider the original bill?

Mr. IGOE. We considered the amendment reported by the committee for the purpose of amendment.

Mr. FESS. The thing to do is to adopt the amendment.

Mr. IGOE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments as amended.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, we went into committee to consider the Senate bill. A motion should now be made that all of the Senate bill after the enacting clause be stricken out and the House committee amendment as amended in Committee of the Whole be substituted. It is one amendment as amended.

Mr. GARD. If you want to go over the whole bill——

Mr. TILSON. You have stricken out the Senate bill, and there is no need of going over the whole House amendment again.

Mr. GARD. The motion is to strike out the Senate bill and to proceed to consider the House bill.

Mr. TILSON. No; to substitute the House bill in committee.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, did the committee consider the House bill or the Senate bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The committee considered the committee amendment reported by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. WINGO. Was the amendment in the nature of a House bill as a proposed substitute?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; to strike out all of the Senate bill after the enacting clause.

Mr. WINGO. Did the committee adopt the motion and amend the substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the motion that we have before us now.

Mr. GARD. A parliamentary inquiry. Is it not true that we considered the Senate bill originally?

Mr. WINGO. My understanding is that the Senate bill was read.

Mr. WALSH. No; the Senate bill was not read. We dispensed with the reading of the Senate bill.

Mr. WINGO. I submit that the gentleman in charge of the bill might move that the committee do now rise and the House adjourn so that the gentleman in charge of the bill can find out "where we are at." [Laughter.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I think it is perfectly plain.

Mr. WINGO. From the statements that have been made, it is not plain to other gentlemen who "complain." I do not know how plain it is to the gentleman.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. We have agreed to this as an amendment to the Senate bill, and now I offer to substitute it for the Senate bill.

Mr. WINGO. If it has been agreed to, why make the motion to substitute?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Because there was no formal motion striking out the Senate bill.

Mr. FESS. On Saturday we agreed to consider the House bill in lieu of the Senate bill, and to consider it as an amendment to the Senate bill.

Mr. WALSH. No; we did not.

Mr. WHALEY. Mr. Chairman, when this bill was taken up the Senate bill was read, and the House substitute was read afterwards as a committee amendment. Then the House amendment was considered and was amended, and that is the situation we are in now.

Mr. TILSON. On page 1678 of the RECORD it appears that the House went into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate bill 3076. The proper motion was made, it was agreed to, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the one specific purpose of considering a Senate bill.

Mr. FESS. What was the first motion in the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. TILSON. I was referring to the action of the House and the purpose for which we went into the committee.

Mr. WINGO. If the Chair will indulge me for just a moment, on page 1693 of the RECORD the Chairman says:

> The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the reading of the Senate bill be dispensed with and that the amendment reported by the Judiciary Committee be read and subject to amendment as an original bill.

That request would not have been in order unless the House had gone into the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the Senate bill. The House in Committee of the Whole did consider the Senate bill. The chairman of the committee asked unanimous consent that the reading of the Senate bill be dispensed with and that the amendment, which is the House bill, be read and subject to amendment as an original bill. After we have perfected the proposed amendment, because that is what it is, an amendment in the nature of a new bill, then the question comes upon the amendment; that is, substituting the House bill by way of amendment.

Mr. WALSH. And that is where we are now.

Mr. WINGO. If that be true, then it occurs to me that having perfected the amendment, the House bill, the question then comes upon the adoption of this amendment as it is finally amended, as amendment to the Senate bill.

Mr. FESS. That is correct.

Mr. WALSH. The Chair stated that half a dozen times.

Mr. WINGO. The question comes up automatically, without a formal motion. The question recurs on the amendment as perfected; that is, striking out all after the enacting clause of the Senate bill and inserting the House bill as perfected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say that he made that statement a few moments ago and will make it again. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HICKS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 3076 and had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. Which amendment is referred to? Because the Senate bill was read.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. There is but one amendment.

The SPEAKER. It is one amendment, substituting the House bill for the Senate bill.

Mr. GARD. What has become of all of the separate amendments?

The SPEAKER. They have been incorporated in the amendment. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GARD) there were—ayes 27, noes 0.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GARD) there were—ayes 31, noes 0.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. VOLSTEAD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

By direction of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa reported the bill (H. R. 11892) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, ordered printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio reserves all points of order on the bill.

Mr. WINGO. Will the Speaker state what the program is to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. The consideration of the river and harbor bill.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills:

H. R. 9183. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to adjust the terms of the contract for the sale of the old post-office property in New Haven, Conn.; and

An act releasing the claim of the United States Government to the block or square of land in the city of Fort Smith, in the State of Arkansas, upon which is situated the old Federal jail, to the city of Fort Smith for a site for a convention hall, community building, or other public purposes.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 31 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 20, 1920, at 12 o'clock noon.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COLORADO SPRINGS, COLO., January 19, 1920.

Senator LAWRENCE C. PHIPPS,
Washington, D. C.:

In view definite date for return railroads to owners and important House and Senate conference to agree on bill to make return possible, we most earnestly urge upon you the support of liberal railroad legislation. Congress can and should instruct Interstate Commerce Commission to so handle rate situation that railroad credit be satisfactorily restored through adequate net earnings. Until net carning satisfactory under these instructions standard return should be continued. We strongly favor legislation declaring strikes of transportation workers on nation-wide basis, as has been threatened, conspiracies and unlawful. We believe strikes in transportation which must imperil welfare and even lives of a helpless public are in violation of the laws of fair play and must be prevented. We prefer absolute responsibility to be placed on Interstate Commerce Commission to grant such rates as will make net operating revenue equal to standard return to Government guarantee and that Interstate Commerce Commission be absolute over State commissions. All roads should enjoy same rates. Excess profits can be taken care of by taxation. At least two members of Interstate Commerce Commission should be railroad men of proven ability and experience.

COLORADO SPRINGS CLEARING HOUSE ASSOCIATION.

Mr. PHIPPS. I present a resolution adopted by the Council of the Denver Civic and Commercial Association relating to the pending peace treaty, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the appropriate committee.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DENVER, COLO., January 16, 1920.

To the members of the Council of the Denver Civic and Commercial Association:

Your committee, appointed to consider the proposed resolution relating to the pending peace treaty in Congress, begs leave to report as follows:

The committee recommends a change in the wording of the resolution, whereby the same should be amended to read as follows, to wit:

"Whereas the President and the Senate are at an apparent deadlock on the adoption of the League of Nations covenant contained in the proposed treaty of peace with Germany, and this impotence of decision only aggravates the world's political, economic, and social uncertainty and unrest by rendering less certain the stability of newly created republics, by retarding production and the extension of credit, and by furnishing fertile soil for seeds of discontent; and

"Whereas this association has already, with reference to the first draft of the covenant for a League of Nations, declared its adherence, by unanimous vote, to the principle of world organization in the interest of international security, with reservations properly safeguarding the interests of America; and

"Whereas it is the belief of this association that among the reservations proposed by the Senate to the second draft of the covenant a common ground can be found by the President and the Senate consistent with the safety of America and also with international organization: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Denver Civic and Commercial Association—

"First, that this association most respectfully but strongly urges that the President and Senate, by mutual concessions, seek a speedy agreement upon reservations consistent alike with the welfare of America and with the establishment of an international order for the maintenance of the future security and peace of the world.

"Second, that a copy of this resolution be sent to the President and to the members of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, and also to the Senators representing Colorado."

Your committee further reports that the proposed resolution as above amended be adopted by the members council.

Respectfully submitted.

ERNEST P. NORRIS,
HENRY VAN KLEECK, Jr.,
W. W. BOOTH,
FRANK N. BRIGGS,
I. F. DOWNER,
Committee.

Mr. SPENCER. I present a resolution of the upper and lower council of Kansas City, Mo., in regard to the situation in the Ukraine. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

DECLARATION OF FRATERNALISM.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I have here a declaration of fraternalism composed by Hon. Edward Newton Haag, of Philadelphia, and adopted by the National Fraternal Congress in August, 1918. It is a patriotic declaration, is not long, and is worthy in every respect of preservation. I ask that it be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DECLARATION OF FRATERNALISM.

"We, the representatives of the fraternal orders and societies of the United States of America, numbering over 20,000,000 members, protecting the homes and conserving the welfare and happiness of a large percentage of the people of this Republic, assembled at the shrine of liberty in the city of Philadelphia this 27th day of August, A. D. 1918, under the auspices of the National Fraternal Congress of America and the National Fraternal Press Association (the Canadian Fraternal Association also being officially represented), in a patriotic fraternal conclave, hereby record our tribute of esteem to the noble founders and those who by their words and deeds alike have vouchsafed to us and our posterity the blessings of freedom.

"In this hour, when so many of our brave sons and daughters are helping to perpetuate those blessings and bring them to the fraternalists of all the world, we pledge ourselves anew to the sacred and immortal principles of life, liberty, and fraternalism which our noble and self-sacrificing forefathers promulgated in Independence Hall, recognizing that they embody the teachings of the founder of fraternalism as applied to home and country and all they hold dear and worth while; that they exemplify our attitude toward the peoples of all the earth who would enjoy these Heaven-inspired blessings and avoid or free themselves from the serfdom of mind, soul, and body which Hohenzollernism would bring about for its selfish and nefarious ends.

"While the just rights of men, women, and children, communities and nations are assailed by our enemies, we here pledge our lives and all we cherish to fight against such attempted injustice and aggression, placing our trust in the God of our fathers and the strong arms and valiant hearts of those who alike know the right and how to attain and perpetuate it, so that the blessings of liberty and fraternalism may be a heritage for all, regardless of nationality or creed.

"As our forefathers brought these blessings to us and this Nation, so would we share them with all humanity seeking them unselfishly.

"The defeat and destruction of Hohenzollernism we recognize as an essential to the attainment of permanent peace, justice, and fraternalism throughout the world.

"Therefore, recognizing the truth of the President's statement that 'whatever disturbs the life of the whole world is the concern of the whole world, and it is our duty to lend the full force of this Nation, moral and physical, to a league of nations,' we stand for a permanent world agreement through a league of nations and justice through an international court, as also with the aid of an international council of conciliation, and to utilize, through organization of the units of the National Fraternal Congress of America and fraternal organizations everywhere, national and international, constructive opinion to make the world safe for democracy.

"After victory has been achieved with honor in the contest for the principles of fraternalism and uplift as opposed to the powers of darkness seeking supremacy, we favor the signing of a declaration of world peace, in Independence Hall, which will be made perpetual by the League of Nations and the international council of conciliation, thus inaugurating the ages of fraternalism.

"National Fraternal Congress of America—Dr. R. H. Gerard, president; W. E. Futch, secretary. National Fraternal Press Association—Mary MacEachern-Baird, president; C. C. Hollenbeck, secretary-treasurer. Patriotic Fraternal Conclave Committee—W. Freeland Kendrick, chairman; Arthur B. Eaton, secretary. City of Philadelphia—Thomas B. Smith, mayor. Executive committee—Edward N. Haag, chairman; Allen P. Cox, C. L. Cadwallader, Charles F. Bowers, Thomas H. Walters, jr."

DISTRICT FIRE DEPARTMENT—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. CALDER. I call up the conference report on House bill 10137 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent——

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I move——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 10137) to amend an act entitled "An act to classify the officers and members of the fire department of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1906, and for other purposes. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York. [Putting the question.] The ayes have it.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask for a division.

On a division the motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the report, which was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10137) to amend an act entitled "An act to classify the officers and members of the fire department of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1906, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment and accept the said House bill with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed by the amendment of the Senate insert the following:

"That sections 2, 3, and 4 of an act entitled 'An act to classify the officers and members of the fire department of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes,' approved June 20, 1906, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 2. "SEC. 2. Section 5 of such act of June 20, 1906, is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"'No member of the fire department of the District of Columbia shall be or become a member of any organization, or of an organization affiliated with another organization, which itself or any subordinate, component, or affiliated organization of which holds, claims, or uses the strike to enforce its demands. MORRIS SHEPPARD, Managers on the part of the Senate.

JAS. P. WOODS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I hope the report will not be agreed to. It increases the pay of the privates in the fire department something like $500 per annum, I think it is, and from that on up, based on a graduated schedule. The matter was given very careful consideration in the committee. The committee cut down the appropriation materially.

The position of firemen is not a very arduous one. They do not incur danger like policemen. They are usually in houses. They stay in out of the weather most of the time. They are just called out to service occasionally. While I think the former schedule should have been increased, yet I feel this increase is unwarranted.

In addition to the $500 increase—and more to some of the different classes—they already received fairly good compensasion and, in addition to that, they got the $240 bonus. Not only that, but one of the serious objections which I have to the bill is that it dates back until the 1st of August, 1919. It thus has a retroactive effect. I am unalterably opposed to any law that will have a retroactive effect.

The management of any business in the country could not long retain the respect of its employees if the stockholders came in and constantly changed the pay which the employees were receiving and antedated the change. Take the president of a bank or a mill or any other of the manufacturers that employ laborers. If the stockholders were to come in and at the end of six months or at the end of a year say that the employees had not been treated fairly and that the management should go back and make up a different pay roll and grant them more pay for the time that is past, the president and the management would never know where they stood and they could not tell whether the business was prosperous or not. They would never know how to obtain credit. The banks would not know whether they were solvent or insolvent, if they were liable at any time to have to go back and change the schedule of the pay of their employees.

So I think it is a bad precedent. Not only that, but I look upon it as a reflection upon the Senate that we should change the law now to take effect last August. If the Senate did not then do its duty as it ought to have done, then this is an arraignment which says that we were negligent in not performing our duty in passing a law at the time that we ought to have passed it.

Then, too, this establishes a precedent all over the country. Congress should pass laws that will be examples to the United States at large. Instead of that, we are here acting like children, as I see it, in changing the bases of pay from time to time in this way. I hope that no law will be passed, and unless I change my mind, I never expect to vote for any law that will have a retroactive effect. It is bad in principle, it is bad in morals, it is bad in influence.

As I said, the duties of a fireman are not arduous. He stays in the house, he is out of the weather, he can read and improve himself if he cares to do so. The basis of pay here was something like $250 a year more than it was in the city of Philadelphia, where they have much more danger and much higher buildings to contend with and many more dangers than exist in the city of Washington.

It does seem to me that it is a good time for us to put on the brakes and that we should apply the hold-back strap to our appropriations. Somebody has to pay these bills. We want economy and yet we act like money grew on trees, and we spread out and increase the pay of these men 50 per cent, in addition to an already good-sized bonus, and then we go back and give them back pay besides that. The people never will know when they are through paying taxes if we establish this kind of a precedent.

I think that the report is entirely out of line with the times. Here are the firemen living in this magnificent city. They are furnished free schools, free books for their children, practically free water, and a great many things free that they get the benefit of, so theirs is not an arduous duty at all.

I trust that the report will not be agreed to. The committee gave careful consideration to the matter and did increase the amount of pay somewhat that the firemen should receive, but only by about one-half of the amount that was eventually placed in the bill as reported by the committee. In the committee I moved that the bill take effect after its passage and not from August 1. This is my reason for objecting to the adoption of the report.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, when the motion was made by the Senator having charge of this bill to take it up for consideration, and the question was put by the Chair to the Senate, the audible response indicated an adverse result. The Chair was about to hold to the contrary, whereupon I asked for a division. I did that deliberately. I wanted to see how many Senators would rise and be counted who had cast their votes against considering this bill. It resulted in two adverse votes—that of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] and myself.

I am used to it. The Senator has not been here as long as I have, and after he has had my experience he will also perceive the folly of trying to stem the tide of appropriations in an American Congress.

Mr. DIAL. I think it speaks very poorly, then, for the wisdom of Congress.

Mr. THOMAS. You might just as well attempt to stem the current of a rushing stream with a shoestring, or some equally insignificant object. I have had seven years of this experience. When I began, an older Senator admonished me against it. He said: "Any man in the Senate who preaches economy will only succeed in making himself a most unpopular Member of that body"; but he added this significant statement: "The people do not want economy. They want this money that is in the Treasury expended just as rapidly and as largely as possible."

That Senator had been conspicuous in the deliberations of this body for years before I came here, and I long ago concluded that the advice he gave was good, and that the assurance he made was true. The people do want the money in the Treasury expended, provided it is expended their way, and as a consequence they long ago invaded the Capitol in groups. They have established permanent headquarters at the Capitol in order that the organized weight of their respective groups may be used as bludgeons upon the consciences and the votes of Members of Congress when their appropriations are on the calendar.

Shortly after President Wilson was inaugurated he called the attention of Congress to the existence of what he called an insidious lobby. The immediate result was a motion by the present honored occupant of the chair [Mr. CUMMINS in the chair] for an investigation. The investigation was held and the existence of that lobby established and its dissolution declared. We have a dozen now—perhaps more than that—although known by other names. One lobby consists of the employees of the Government of the United States; another is the American Federation of Labor; another is the Rivers and Harbors Improvement Association, including improvements for the Mississippi River; another is the United States Chamber of Commerce; another is the organized farmers. According to the papers, they have just secured a fine plot of land and propose to erect here a temple from which they will dispense their influences, which is quite as proper and, in fact, perhaps necessary because of the existence of these others. Those who are behind the proposed bonus of nine hundred millions, which is only a starter, for our returning soldiers are organizing another. God knows how many more will be created between now and the expiration of this Congress. I do not know. The only lobby not present here is a lobby of taxpayers. They do not amount to much, anyhow. All they have to do is to stand still while they are being milked. If one of them should kick over the pail once in a while he might be punished for his rashness.

The Senator is up against a situation that is invincible and will continue to be invincible until the taxpayers of the country find out that their easy-going, tolerant course is leading not only to their own bankruptcy but to that of the Nation. This bill is comparatively small in its amount. I suppose it will increase the expenses a few million dollars per year, but it has behind it organized forces which are spread all over the country, because the organizations of employees are a constituent branch of the organizations of workmen all over the country, and its main purpose is obvious—to get money from the Treasury of the United States. Demand it—for these gentlemen no longer request, they demand—demand it and you will get it. The Senator is opposing it. I admire his spirit; but, as a seasoned victim of a great many defeats along the same line, I admonish him that he is wasting his time and his breath, and will continue to waste time and breath until the people wake up. I thought they would have awakened long ago, but after a long and weary vigil of seven years I confess I do not see any symptoms of it.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. DIAL. Does not the Senator think that the people are waking up rapidly now? Before this war there were about 400,000 people in the United States who owned bonds and now there are something like 21,000,000 who own bonds, and those bonds are under par. Does not the Senator think that they are getting tired of seeing the security of the Government depreciate and taxes increasing?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not see any signs of it at all. On the contrary, the present generation is the most luxurious, the most extravagant, the most indifferent to its own welfare and to the welfare of the Nation that I have encountered in my sojourn of 70 years upon this earth.

Bills were reported this morning favorably from the Committee on Pensions that will only add about a hundred millions to our fixed annual expenditures. A hundred millions in these days is comparatively unimportant, because we are accustomed to large figures; but the Senator knows just as well as I do why those bills have been reported. We are aproaching a presidential election, and the pension theory now is that the Government owes a living to every man who ever shouldered a musket. The old theory, and the only theory which can justify the pension system, is based upon service and disability; and there is no more reason why the Government should support a man who has shouldered a musket and done his duty by guaranteeing him a livelihood from the Treasury of the United States than there is for doing the same thing for every farmer who handled a hoe and every workman who was employed in the munition factories of the land during the previous war. Those bills will pass. Republican orators and Democratic orators want something on which to base their ad captandum appeals. The heroism and patriotism of the old soldier will be sung by both parties, each of which will point to the votes of its representatives in Congress in behalf of these measures, and each will expect in consequence the political support of the organizations.

I shall not waste the time of the Senate to discuss this bill any longer. In fact, I should not have said anything but for the protest of the Senator from South Carolina. I sympathize with him as a fellow sufferer in the vain effort to secure some consideration for the public welfare in the matter of appropriations. I merely wished to give him a brief reminder of my own experience, that he might understand how useless it is to kick against the pricks. The United States Treasury, in popular estimation, is a source of self-creating and never-failing abundance, and it is the duty of every Representative and every Senator to get as much as possible out of it for the people whom he represents. Let the carnival continue.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, referring to the specific matter before the Senate, I desire to say that it does seem to me that these salaries are by no means excessive. We have to consider conditions as they are, and these men do perform very high-class service, and they do run considerable risk. Their employment is more or less hazardous and dangerous, and they ought to be paid enough upon which to live and support families.

I do not believe that the items set forth in section 4 of the bill provide excessive salaries for these people. They earn this money. They are entitled to it. They render a most important and most high-class service to the public. The feature, however, about making the act retroactive seems to me objectionable. I am inclined to agree with the Senator from South Carolina on that point. It is a bad precedent, it is a bad practice, to make these laws retroactive.

The bill makes a correction as to the salaries of these employees, and that correction I think is due them. I believe we ought to increase their salaries, but I do not think it is advisable to have that increase date back to August 1, 1919. That seems to me to be not only not merited by the conditions and by the situation generally but, as I say, it is a bad practice. On that account I find fault with this report, not on account of the salaries being excessive.

I am thoroughly in accord with the sentiment expressed here that we must adopt and stick to a policy of rigid economy in public expenditures. We must do that, and that is the position we should take here and maintain throughout. That is not, however, inconsistent with a proper allowance of compensation for services actually rendered.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. CALDER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator if in the House bill or the Senate bill the retroactive feature was incorporated?

Mr. FLETCHER. I am not a member of the committee, and therefore I can not answer the question of the Senator.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. CALDER. I will say to the Senator that the retroactive feature was incorporated in both the House and the Senate bills, and was not in conference. That feature also was contained in the police bill which passed before the holidays, and it was contained in the Post Office salary-increase bill which we passed in the last session. It is not, therefore, a precedent. I might add that that question came up for the consideration of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and was discussed at length, but because the feature was contained in the police bill it was left in this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. My object in asking the question was to find out whether that was new matter, put in the conference report by the conferees; but if the Senator says the retroactive feature was not only in the House bill but was also in the Senate bill, then, of course, it was not in conference.

Mr. CALDER. I can assure the Senator of that fact.

Mr. President, just a word. As I said a moment ago in interrupting the Senator from Utah, the retroactive feature of this bill was in the police bill, and was in this bill as it passed both Houses. It was also contained in the Post Office salary-increase bill that we passed before the holidays. I will also say, in response to the statement of the Senator from Colorado, that there has been no propaganda for this bill outside of the District of Columbia. In fact, the only propaganda that has come to the committee was against the provision of the bill dealing with the right of the men in the fire department to belong to a union. The American Federation of Labor and the firemen's organization of the city protested against that particular provision of the bill; but the committee felt that that provision having been in the police bill it should also be in this bill. The increases of pay are quite large, it is true—three, four, and five hundred dollars—but they are in exact accord with the provisions of the police bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, in view of what the Senator says, I want to modify the statement which I made a few minutes ago, because I am delighted to know that one appropriation bill has passed through both Houses of Congress without the influence of some organized power behind it.

Mr. CALDER. I can assure the Senator of that fact.

It seems to me, in view of the fact that these men are required to work nearly 30 days out of every month, and are on duty nearly 24 hours a day, that this increase is not out of keeping with the work they are called upon to do.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I think we were setting a bad precedent when we passed the police bill. I opposed that bill having a retroactive feature. I knew that it would come back to plague us in other legislation. I oppose this bill on account of its retroactive feature, and I shall vote against all others having a retroactive feature. I think there should be some increase; but, as I said before, I think this amount is excessive.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

LOAN OF ARMY RIFLES.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, upon yesterday, as I understand, the Senate passed the bill (H. R. 9112) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan Army rifles to posts of the American Legion. Unfortunately the committee amendment which appears upon page 2 of the bill was incorrectly printed, and as it reads it fails to make sense. I desire to know if I would be within my rights in a parliamentary sense if I should ask unanimous consent for the reconsideration of the vote by which the bill passed the Senate yesterday, in order that I might offer an amendment perfecting the committee amendment, and then ask for the repassage of the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is advised that the bill is still in the possession of the Senate, and that the request of the Senator from New York would be in order.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the Senate reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. On page 2, the committee amendment, as printed, reads:

Provided, however, That not to exceed 10 such rifles to any one post.

I ask that the words "shall be issued" be inserted after the word "rifles," so that it will read:

Provided, however, That not to exceed 10 such rifles shall be issued to any one post.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that there must be consent for the reconsideration of the action of the Senate in passing the bill to a third reading in order to open the bill to amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I understand. Then, to retrace further the parliamentary steps, I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the bill was reported from the Committee of the Whole to the Senate be reconsidered. Is that the correct procedure?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that it is not necessary to go further back than the stage at which the bill was open to amendment in the Senate. Is there objection to reconsideration of the action of the Senate in passing the bill to a third reading? The Chair hears none. The bill is now in the Senate and open to amendment.

The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment of the committee by inserting after the word "rifles" the words "shall be issued," so that it will read:

Provided, however, That not to exceed 10 such rifles shall be issued to any one post.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

AMERICANIZATION OF ALIENS.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, Senate bill 3315.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3315) to promote Americanization by providing for cooperation with the several States in the education of non-English-speaking persons and the assimilation of foreign-born residents, and for other purposes.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Iowa if he will not yield, so that we can take up Senate resolution 247?

Mr. KENYON. I dislike to refuse any request of the Senator from Georgia, but I am anxious that we shall make progress with this bill. I think we can finish it this afternoon, and I am afraid the Senator's resolution will simply result in loss of time, there is so much opposition to it. I am not opposed to it myself.

I understand the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] wishes to give notice on some matter, and I will yield to him for a few moments.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there are one or two other Senators interested in the bill who have asked that a quorum be called when it is taken up. I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harding	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Ball	Harris	New	Smoot
Beckham	Harrison	Newberry	Spencer
Calder	Henderson	Norris	Stanley
Capper	Jones, N. Mex.	Nugent	Sterling
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Sutherland
Colt	Kendrick	Owen	Thomas
Culberson	Kenyon	Phelan	Townsend
Cummins	King	Phipps	Underwood
Curtis	Kirby	Pomerene	Wadsworth
Dial	McCormick	Robinson	Walsh, Mass.
Fletcher	McKellar	Sheppard	Warren
France	McLean	Sherman	Watson
Gerry	McNary	Shields	Williams
Gronna	Moses	Smith, Md.

Mr. MOSES. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES], on account of illness in his family, and ask that the announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent due to illness. I wish to have this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. McCORMICK. I desire to announce that the other members of the subcommittee of the Naval Affairs Committee, the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], are detained at a meeting of the subcommittee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My colleague, the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], is absent on official business.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is detained by illness in his family.

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] are absent on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

FEDERAL FARM LOAN ACT.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I simply desire to give notice that as soon as the pending measure is disposed of, and if it is otherwise agreeable, I shall ask the Senate to consider the bill (H. R. 9065) to amend sections 3, 8, 10, 12, and 21 of the act approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm-loan act. I want to say now that while the bill seems to be somewhat formidable, as it contains a vast number of amendments, none of them affect the substantial provisions of the farm-loan act. They are all recommended by the Federal Farm Loan Board and are simply for the purpose of improving the administrative machinery of the act.

For instance, the bill creates an acting registrar who will perform the duties of the registrar when he is disabled for any reason.

It also extends the amount of the minimum bond from $25 to $42 for the purpose of avoiding fractions in bookkeeping.

It also permits the board to raise a sum of money sufficient to pay the Secretary of the Treasury and the loan committee, and there are other immaterial provisions affecting the method of the operation of the act. The only two sections of the bill which aroused opposition in the committee were stricken from the bill by the committee.

The bill has been on the calendar for nearly three months and the Farm Loan Board are very anxious to have it passed. I repeat that as soon as the pending measure is disposed of I shall ask the Senate to take up the bill. I do not think it will occupy more than 10 minutes, for I know of no possible opposition to it.

SEDITIOUS ACTS AND UTTERANCES.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, by the courtesy of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] I desire to call attention to a matter relating to the antisedition bill which lately passed the Senate and the antisedition bill pending in the House. I feel impelled to do this by reason of a purported interview given by Mr. Samuel Gompers appearing in yesterday's paper, and my attention having been called to it on yesterday. I think I am justified in doing this for the reason that there seems to be a studied effort to misrepresent the antisedition bill which passed the Senate, its purpose and object.

To quote briefly from the article in which the interview appears and from the interview I read:

> Formal announcement that the American Federation of Labor would oppose "with whatever power it may possess" the enactment of the antisedition bills now pending in Congress was made yesterday in a statement issued by Samuel Gompers, president of the federation.
> The attack of organized labor, its chieftain indicated, will be directed impartially against the Sterling bill, recently passed by the Senate, and against the Graham measure, based on suggestions of Attorney General Palmer, and awaiting action by the House Rules Committee for a special rule to expedite consideration.
> Referring to the two measures as one bill, President Gompers declared its enactment "would violate the Constitution and rob the whole American people of their most cherished and basic guaranties of free government."

Mr. President, during the discussion of the Sterling bill in the Senate there was very little discussion of the real issues involved in and presented by the bill itself. There was much general discussion, much eloquent discussion of freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and in opposition to a censorship of the press, and I found myself responding in sentiment to much that was said by those who apparently were opposed to the bill. But, Mr. President, the issues presented by the bill were simply as to whether it should be lawful to advocate the overthrow of the Government of the United States or of all government by force or violence; whether it should be lawful to use the mails of the United States for the purpose of advocating the overthrow of the Government by force or violence; whether it should be lawful to import into the United States literature which advocated the overthrow of the Government by force or violence. Those were the main issues presented by that bill.

Mr. President, when Mr. Gompers or anyone else says that he is opposed to a law which would prevent the advocacy of the overthrow of this Government by force or violence then Mr. Gompers or whosoever it may be, it seems to me, puts himself in a position where his loyalty to the Government of the United States might well be questioned.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FRANCE. I do not understand the Senator to be stating that that was Mr. Gompers's position, however?

Mr. STERLING. No; I am not stating that that was Mr. Gompers's exact position, but I leave it to the Senator from Maryland to state what the inference is that may be drawn from Mr. Gompers's statement.

Mr. FRANCE. May I ask the Senator whether he has had inserted in the RECORD the full statement of Mr. Gompers on the subject?

Mr. STERLING. I have read a portion of it, and I shall read other portions of it right now.

Mr. FRANCE. I hope the Senator will have the whole statement placed in the RECORD.

Mr. STERLING. I can do that. I am reading the material parts of it. He further says:

> In fact, it would perpetuate an autocratic censorship over the entire American press.

No censorship is provided, either in the bill which passed the Senate, or, as I understand it, in the pending House bill. Mr. Gompers says further:

> It can be used to kill free speech and free assembly. It strikes a deadly blow at legitimate organizations of labor or any other progressive movement for the betterment of the masses which may be opposed by the advocates of privilege and reaction.

Mr. President, I hold no brief for the House bill. It is a much longer bill than the bill which passed the Senate. It contains, I think, 11 sections, and the Senate bill contains only 5. The House bill covers some things that are not covered by the Senate bill. But Mr. Gompers makes no distinction. He speaks of the two as one bill. He further says:

> We oppose this bill because every legitimate purpose for which it is framed is already covered by existing law. Its illegitimate features, which compose two-thirds of the draft, are utterly autocratic, imperialistic, and un-American.

I say, Mr. President, that no feature of the bill which passed the Senate is distinctly covered by existing law, and if it is covered by existing law, then why should not the efforts of a gentleman opposed to such a law be directed toward the repeal of that law rather than in opposing this measure? My position is that if it is like existing law, no great harm will come to the country or to any particular interest by its enactment.

And now, to satisfy the Senator from Maryland, I ask that the entire interview be printed in the RECORD, following my remarks.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

Mr. STERLING. Further, Mr. President, along this same line, I want to call attention to other statements equally misleading; and first, from the Scripps Editorial Board, R. P. Scripps, editor and manager. This is the first information I have had regarding the Scripps Editorial Board. This was received day before yesterday:

Editorial.

For a hundred years this country has got along very well without laws against propaganda or political criticism. The Government has not had to put down insurrection. There has been no conviction for treason even during war time.

The passage of the Sterling or Graham bills, or any legislation of this sort, is an abandonment of this Nation's settled policy.

It will be observed that there is still no distinction made between the Sterling bill and the Graham bill. The failure to distinguish shows the motive of opposition of this kind. But I quote:

Freedom to discuss the Government and to criticize its policies, and even to advocate changes, is the foundation stone on which this attempt at democracy was built.

I agree with that. I make no complaint whatsoever of that assertion, but that is beside the mark and aside from any issue that has ever been presented in the bill which passed the Senate, and I think aside from any issue involved in the bill before the House.

It says:

The proposed legislation makes a crime of beliefs, free discussion, or the distribution of argument.

There is not a word in the Senate bill in regard to a belief or holding anybody responsible for belief.

Next I have a communication received yesterday morning from Mr. Charles H. Unverzagt, 405 Lexington Avenue, New York City, in which he says:

I am in receipt of yours of 14th with bill S. 3317. You say this is a sedition bill and not an espionage bill.

He had previously written me for a copy of the bill.

I think practically all of the papers in New York have denounced your bill and others of like character. According to these bills under the constructions always placed upon them by the courts, if any party attempted to change the Constitution or get an amendment to the Constitution, or to criticize a public officer who turned out to be a crook, it would be putting himself in a very perilous position.

Mr. President, that is an absolute misapprehension of the terms of the bill and what the bill seeks to accomplish. I think I am justified in going further and in saying it is a deliberate misinterpretation of the Senate bill.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. I call attention of the Senator to the last three lines of paragraph 5 of the Graham bill.

Mr. STERLING. I have not the Graham bill before me. I am not, as I said a moment ago, I will say to the Senator from Oklahoma, holding a brief for the Graham bill. I am referring to the bill that passed the Senate.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the last three lines referred to contain a joker, perhaps; but whether it does or does not, the plain meaning of it is that anyone who attempts to "overthrow, change, or defeat the Constitution of the United States and the laws and authorities thereof," without using the words "force and violence" at all, that anyone who would advocate the prohibition amendment or the woman's suffrage amendment under that section and that language would be subject to the penalties.

Mr. STERLING. I appreciate, I will say to the Senator from Oklahoma, clearly the distinction, and that if the House bill does not contain the term "force and violence" as an element of the offense there may be some grounds of objection to such a bill.

Mr. OWEN. Yes; and it is proposed to substitute the Graham bill for the bill that passed the Senate.

Mr. STERLING. I understand that; and one purpose which will be served in calling attention to these matters this morning is the distinction between the House bill and the Senate bill.

It is worth while sometimes to consider the source from which some of these communications and views come. I took the pains to make a little inquiry in regard to Mr. Unverzagt. He was under surveillance at the beginning of the war and during the war because of pro-German proclivities, and is under indictment now, according to the information I have received, in the State of New York for himself attempting through the mails to promote fraudulent enterprises. That is the record of Mr. Unverzagt. But further:

I hold in my hand, Mr. President, a pamphlet entitled "The Criminal Leadership of Labor," being an address delivered by Mr. Samuel Harden Church, president of Carnegie Institute, Pittsburgh, November 11 last, an Armistice Day address. May I just quote briefly from that, as follows:

No government in any country or in any age has ever been able to perpetuate itself when it has tolerated within its dominion a force that is stronger than itself. The time has come when in the development of our American civilization we must learn whether the Government, which our forefathers established upon the foundations of law, order, justice, and liberty, shall be paramount in the affairs of the Nation, or whether the life of the people shall be hindered, vexed, and destroyed by the false leaders of labor.

One or two other quotations that are pertinent, particularly so because of the interview given out by Mr. Gompers:

For seven years Mr. Samuel Gompers, president of that organization—

The American Federation of Labor—has sat at Washington and dictated the legislation which controls management, industry, and labor alike. Yet it was within that seven years that some 29 of the immediate subordinate officials of Mr. Gompers were sent to the penitentiary after conviction for dynamiting and murder. And at the present time 11 of the men who were then convicted hold office in the Iron Workers' Union, a branch of the American Federation of Labor, including the president, M. J. Morrin. One of these convicted men, Frank M. Ryan, who was president at the time of the trial, is now a general organizer for the union in the Chicago district, and took a leading part in the present steel-strike movement. Mr. William Z. Foster, the organizer of the present steel strike and a subordinate official of Mr. Gompers in the American Federation of Labor, proclaims in his book, Syndicalism, that he is an advocate of sabotage and of the seizure and confiscation of all property—

And so forth.

Mr. President, it occurs to me that Mr. Gompers just at present has other business on hand which might well engage his attention. Or it may be that there is method in his course. An interview like that given out by Mr. Gompers wholly misinterpreting the purpose and intent of the bill which passed the Senate, and, as I think, knowingly so, indicates that he feels that he must now at this particular juncture in his career court the favor of the extreme radicals in order that he may hold his power and his place as president of the American Federation of Labor.

I wish to submit, and I think I shall ask to have read at the desk, the editorial appearing in this morning's Post.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPENCER in the chair). If there is no objection, it will be read.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PUNISH THE FIREBUGS OF SEDITION.

"The reds, anarchists, domestic enemies, and kindred vermin are making a concerted howl against the sedition bills in Congress. Free speech is in peril, they say; free speech, that sacred and inviolable right guaranteed by the Constitution.

"What a spectacle it is to see the Constitution invoked by these scoundrels who seek to destroy it! What an uncomplimentary standard of American intelligence they must have, these foreign and anti-American elements which now ask patriotic citizens to protect unbridled speech in order that treason may do its work unhampered!

"Unfortunately there are some Americans who are taken in by such fallacies as those uttered by the enemies of the United States. Free speech! It sounds well. Who would dare to stop the mouth of a man who honestly utters his thoughts in the hope of benefiting the world? Isn't America the land of the free? The curbing of free speech is the act of tyrants, czars, and autocrats. Let ideas be fought with better ideas. The poison gas of treasonable speech will evaporate when it is released, according to a learned jurist. Let it flow freely; let it spread where it will. If you curb it, if you deprive a man of the right to utter whatever he pleases, something terrible will happen. He will explode, perhaps; or perhaps the Constitution will explode; or maybe both will blow up in dire combustion. So many worthy Americans are fooled into taking an attitude against the restraint of treason by listening to specious arguments which always conceal the difference between the right of free speech and the abuse of that right.

"There is treason of the tongue as well as of the hand. Of the two treason by words is the more subtle and often the more dangerous.

"Who is injured by a law that punishes for treason by speech? Is the patriot hurt or the law-abiding citizen? Is his freedom of speech curtailed? No! But the Bolshevik, the treasonable citizen who hates his own government, the foreign spy, the professional agitator, and the anarchist, all these foul birds are hurt. They are hurt only when they commit crime. They can not be injured by any law, however drastic, if they do not violate it.

"But some of them say, 'We are not trying to injure anybody. We do not advocate anything treasonable. We are progressives, liberals, forward-lookers who seek only the benefit of humanity. Yet you would make it a crime for us to advocate reforms and would put us in jail if we criticized wrongs in the Government.'

"The short and ugly answer to such statements is the best: You lie, and you know you lie. The reds and their sympathizers who are seeking to destroy the United States Constitution and the existing system of society are not merely advocating reforms and are not simply criticizing wrongs in the Government or in society. They are striving to inflame the passions of the ignorant and the criminal so that the Government shall be overturned by force and violence. That is their aim. The boldest of them make no concealment of their purpose. Scratch a Bolshevik sympathizer and you find an enemy of the United States. He may be a dangerous criminal, imbued with devilish intentions and extremely shrewd in concealing his purpose; or he may be a coarse, gullible fool, who swallows from foreign sources all sorts of socialistic and anarchistic rubbish, mistaking it for truth.

"It does not matter whether an enemy of the United States is a ringleader of criminals or a dupe of criminals, if he raises his hand against the American flag he should die. If he advocates the overturn of this Government by violence he should die, like the assassin that he is and would be. If he uses speech for the incitement of crime he should suffer punishment commensurate with the crime. If his words and preachings result in the death of human beings he should die, for he is their murderer. If he cloaks his criminal preachings in double-meaning words and is then exposed by conclusive evidence to be criminal in intent and effect he should be punished accordingly.

"What has become of the guardians of American liberty that they do not watch the skulkers who seek to set fire to the edifice from within? When a would-be firebug is caught in the act, is he released on the ground of the inalienable right of every man to carry a match to light his cigarette? Must the building be wrapped in flames before the firebug can be arrested?

"The law books are full of preventive statutes, and no one except the criminal complains of them. Who expects to see a time when rogues will have a good opinion of the law? What nation, except Bolshevist Russia, takes its laws from assassins and anarchists and punishes only the thrifty and the patriotic?

"Congress should go ahead and enact laws with teeth in them, making treasonable speech a crime, and also making it a crime for aliens to spread anarchy and violence by word of mouth or by the printed word. Every citizen guilty of treasonable speech or writing should be punished most severely. He knows better, and his offense is even greater than that of the foreign spy. Let the law be as drastic as it may, it will never harm an American patriot or an honest and orderly alien."

The article from the morning Post is as follows:

"ASSAILS 'RED' BILLS—GOMPERS CALLS ACTS PROPOSED BLOW AT FREE GOVERNMENT—TO BRING REIGN OF TERROR—WOULD ALARM NATION IF UNDERSTOOD, SAYS LABOR HEAD—RESTRICTS WEARING BUTTONS AND BARS MAILING LETTERS URGING RESISTANCE OF INJUNCTION—POWERFUL IN STRIKES.

"Formal announcement that the American Federation of Labor would oppose 'with whatever power it may possess' the enactment of the antisedition bills now pending in Congress was made yesterday in a statement issued by Samuel Gompers, president of the federation.

"The attack of organized labor, its chieftain indicated, will be directed impartially against the Sterling bill, recently passed by the Senate, and against the Graham measure, based on suggestions of Attorney General Palmer, and awaiting action by the House Rules Committee for a special rule to expedite consideration.

"Referring to the two measures as one bill, President Gompers declared its enactment 'would violate the Constitution and rob the whole American people of their most cherished and basic guarantees of free government.'

"PEOPLE NOT AWARE OF PERIL.

"'If the American people, and in fact a majority of the Members of Congress, were awake to the dangers concealed in this bill, a storm of indignation would sweep the Nation.

"'It has been widely advertised that this measure protects free speech fully, but prevents advocacy of forcible revolution, bolshevism, and anarchy. In fact, it would perpetuate an autocratic censorship over the entire American press. It can be used to kill free speech and free assembly. It strikes a deadly blow at legitimate organizations of labor or any other progressive movement for the betterment of the masses which may be opposed by the advocates of privilege and reaction.

"'We yield to no man, in public office or out, in our loyalty to the Constitution and institutions of this Republic; no self-respecting man has questioned, or dare question, that loyalty. We are for evolution, not revolution; for ballots, not bullets; for a majority rule, not class dictatorship of bolshevism, plutocracy, or of the profiteer.

"COVERED BY EXISTING LAW.

"'We oppose this bill because every legitimate purpose for which it is framed is already covered by existing law. Its illegitimate features, which compose two-thirds of the draft, are utterly autocratic, imperialistic, and un-American.'

"Referring to 'Attorney General Palmer's contention that new laws are necessary to reach the individual who advocates opposition to the Government by violence,' Mr. Gompers cited section 4 of the Penal Code, and asked:

"'If revolution is afoot, why has not the Department of Justice made prosecutions under that section?

"'Section 5 of the bill, unbelievable as it may seem,' he continued, 'makes it a crime to wear in public any button of an organization whose purpose it is to obtain an amendment to the Constitution of the United States of any existing Federal law.'

"UNDUE POWER OVER MAILS.

"'Section 6 perpetuates the censorship of the Postmaster General over all newspapers and printed matter. The so-called Borah amendment, providing a court review of the Postmaster General's action, is sound in principle, but is inadequate to afford protection as a practical matter to a publisher against the autocratic action of the Postmaster General.

"'More amazing still, the proviso sets up a censorship over any man's private correspondence by the Postmaster General. It would be criminal, for example, for a man to send a letter advocating resistance to an injunction issued by a Federal judge ordering workers on strike to go back to work. Moreover, this section can be used to prevent the organization of colored labor, on the grounds of inciting "racial prejudice, the intended or probable result of which appeal is to cause rioting," etc. No doubt advocacy of, or opposition to, the cause of Irish freedom would in some sections be prohibited.

"'Section 7 would exclude from this country, even for libraries and investigators, a large portion of the labor literature of Europe.

"THREAT AIMED AT LABOR.

"'Sections 9, 10, and 11 contain a grave threat aimed at labor. Section 9 makes unlawful every association which seeks "directly or indirectly" to make political change by injury to private property. It is unhappily true that even a legitimate strike may result in indirect injury to the employer's private property rights in his business. The recent steel and coal strikes were both falsely heralded as attempts to overthrow our Government.

"'If a hostile Federal judge should decide that any particular strike has a political end in view and the striking union is affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, the American Federation of Labor would be compelled at once to expel the striking union or itself become unlawful. And it would at once become a crime punishable by up to 20 years' imprisonment, or up to $20,000 fine, or both, for any person anywhere in the Nation to rent a hall or business office to any labor organization affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, or to give or loan it money to send strike relief to starving women and children.

"WOULD BE GOVERNMENT OF MEN.

"'In general, this is a bill against opinion and advocacy. It proposed to set up not a government of law but of men, because under its vague and sweeping terms no man would know what the law is until the Federal judges interpret its meaning.

"'The inevitable result of this bill, if enacted, would be to spread a reign of terror over the United States, fill the country with spies and special agents of the Department of Justice, fill the land with suspicion, and heresy hunting would quickly become a national industry. If the principles of Magna Charta and the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States are not worth fighting to preserve, I have wholly misconceived what patriotism and love of freedom means.'"

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I had no intention of taking time on the pending bill to talk about an antisedition bill that has passed, but it seems to me that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] has said some things on the subject that ought not to go entirely unanswered.

I spoke at length on the bill when it was before the Senate, and I want to say now, as I said then, that I cast no reflection upon any men who favor the bill. I freely concede their patriotic impulses and intent. In no sense do I question the motive of any man who favors that legislation. But, Mr. President, there are those who are opposed to legislation of that kind who are moved by motives which are just as patriotic and just as lofty as those who favored it.

In my judgment it comes with poor grace from the Senator from South Dakota on the floor of the Senate to question the patriotism or the loyalty, for instance, of Samuel Gompers. I hold no brief for Mr. Gompers. I would not raise my voice if he were here to defend himself. However many of us have disagreed with Mr. Gompers and do disagree as to many of his ideas, I believe that every man who has followed his course during the war must concede that his conduct and his actions have been loyal to the last degree; that he showed an interest in the success of our undertaking in the war second to no other man; and he spent his time and his energy and his ability in that direction all through.

When the antisedition bill was before the Senate I said that there was no disagreement here as to the desirability of protecting in every way the Government of the United States from those who would assail it, but those of us who opposed the bill believed that that kind of legislation had a tendency to bring about bolshevistic activities, to bring about organizations that were detrimental to free government, and we cited instances of history to bear out that theory.

We may be wrong, and it may be that the only way to preserve the Government is to go to the extent of not permitting anybody to criticize it. But believing in free government and having a firm faith that the government that is free is able to withstand the criticism of anybody in open debate before the world, I am opposed particularly to legislation such as was in the bill that passed here giving the arbitrary power that that bill gave to the Postmaster General. The citations which the Senator from South Dakota has read from what Mr. Gompers said I believe to be justified, that that power will be, perhaps not at once but in time, used by those in power to suppress the liberties of the people and to prevent free speech and a free press.

When that bill was before the Senate I gave many instances where already under existing law that had been done. I cited at some length one of the leading newspapers in the United States which confessed editorially that it had printed columns of stuff sent out by governmental officials that it knew was not true and misrepresented conditions and facts.

It has been the history of government from the beginning of civilization that such powers, given to men who can enforce them without jury trial and without opportunity for men to be heard in their own defense, in time become oppressive. As Washington said in his Farewell Address, even though good is accomplished in an instance, that kind of power by unworthy officials ultimately is seized upon to oppress people. Thus one tyrant in doing an unlawful act cites as a precedent some autocratic power that may have been used at the time to do a good act.

I have another instance that I am going to take this occasion to cite; but, before I do it, the Senator from South Dakota referred to the book on "Syndicalism." Foster is condemned for writing the book. He lost caste at once when it was known that he wrote it, although it ought to be said in his defense that he said he changed his mind between the date when he wrote it, which was several years ago, and the present time; but he lost caste at once with the committee and with the country. That book would be enough to deport Foster if he were an alien, upon a warrant signed in blank issued by the Department of Labor and carried around by some sleuth or in the hands of a representative of the Department of Justice. And yet all we needed to condemn Foster and his book was to let the light of publicity come upon it and let the people see it in open discussion.

But what happened? I called attention to it the other day that that very book, after it had been disclosed that Foster wrote it, was published by the Steel Co. and circulated all over the country; and I commend them for the action they took.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. It was in my mind to call the attention of the Senator the other day when he made the same assertion to the effect that it was published by the Steel Co. It may have been. I am not disputing the Senator's statement, but I would like to know his authority for the statement.

Mr. NORRIS. I had the authority here the other day, I will say to the Senator. It was an article which I had on my desk at the time I made the statement, but I do not have it here now. I can furnish it to the Senator. I think I can find it again. I thought some one might question my authority for the statement, and I had it as the source of my authority. I had the complete article at the time I spoke. It was an article published in some magazine or newspaper, but I have forgotten. I do not remember what it was published in or who was the author.

Mr. STERLING. I very well recall the statement of Mr. Foster when he was on the witness stand before the committee in that regard, that his book had been found in the hands of some of the steel employees. I asked Mr. Foster if he had published it and circulated it, and he said no; he did not know how it had been done. Somebody had published it, but he did not charge the Steel Co. with having published it.

Mr. NORRIS. So the Steel Corporation had not published it, I suppose, at that time. I think they published it afterwards. They probably did not know about it until the committee brought it out. Maybe they did. I do not know.

Mr. STERLING. This was long after the strike, as the Senator will recall, when this investigation was had, and at that time this book was found in the hands of some of the employees of the company.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and a man found in possession of that book was condemned. If the Steel Corporation, or Mr. Gary, or any of its officers, were found in possession of it, I do not suppose they would have been condemned. The point I want to make is, let us come out in the open. I think the Steel Corporation did right in publishing it; yet, if you apply to them the same law that you apply to the other fellow, you would either send them to jail or, if they were aliens, you would send them across the ocean in a ship of stone with sails of lead.

The danger of laws of this kind is that they will be abused. We can not place in the hands of anyone the enforcement of a law against free speech without its being in danger. The other day I gave a great many instances where existing law had been abused, and now I am going to give you one which to my mind is a flagrant exhibition of just what can happen and what does happen.

When the war was declared, the governor of the State of Nebraska called a special session of the legislature for various purposes to help carry on the war, moved by the highest motives of patriotic duty, and the legislature passed a sedition act; and, Mr. President, I want it to be distinctly understood that I am not charging that anywhere any of those officials, either the governor or the legislature, did anything but what they conceived to be their highest duty. They passed a sedition act. I am going to read a little of it and show what happened. It is a long act. It gives a definition of a large number of things that are prohibited, and then provides that anybody who violates them shall be punished by imprisonment in the county jail or in the State penitentiary for any period not exceeding 20 years.

Now, just bear in mind that the maximum penalty under this law is 20 years in the State prison. Part of section 1 of this act reads as follows:

> If any person, with intent to obstruct, hinder, delay, discourage, hamper, or otherwise interfere with the efficient prosecution of the war in which the Government of the United States is now engaged, shall—

And then it enumerates a whole lot of things, commencing with "(a)" and running clear down to "(m)", and "(m)" is as follows:

> Being physically able to work and not engaged in any useful occupation, refuse employment, or remain habitually idle when useful employment is obtainable.

Now, let me read that law, omitting all other definitions but this, and put it together, and let us see what we have:

> If any person, with intent to obstruct, hinder, delay, discourage, hamper, or otherwise interfere with the efficient prosecution of the war in which the Government of the United States is now engaged, shall * * * (m) being physically able to work and not engaged in any useful occupation, refuse employment or remain habitually idle when useful employment is obtainable—

Then, if found guilty of that, he shall go to the penitentiary for 20 years.

Mr. President, no one can pick a flaw, particularly, with anything in that law. It is the same with all sedition laws. We wanted everybody to work who was able to work and could get work, and the time had come when it was necessary to put men in prison if they could get work and did not work. That would appeal to a patriotic spirit, a patriotic citizen. But, now, let us see what happened. Just as I tried to point out, the danger of these laws consists in placing in the hands of some enforcing officer a power by which he can crush the liberty out of the citizen, and, if carried to its extreme and carried on year after year, ultimately destroys the Government itself, as George Washington has so forcefully said in his farewell message.

That bill became a law, and the attorney general of that State was called upon to render an opinion as to what the words "useful occupation" meant, as used in that statute. I will have the whole opinion published, but I will read the part of it that I want to comment on. In the last paragraph of that opinion he said:

> In my opinion all persons engaged in the organization of clubs, leagues, societies, or associations which do not have for their object the furtherance of the progress of the war are not engaged in a useful occupation. Any occupation which is instrumental in keeping alive existing military, commercial, or governmental activities is useful, but any occupation which has for its object, either directly or indirectly, the opposition to our present form or system of government, the creation of new political parties, the determination of economic questions not connected with the war, and many other acts and deeds too numerous to mention, are not useful occupations. There may be instances, as I have stated, where an occupation might be useful if properly followed, but becomes useless under the meaning of the act referred to when attempted in communities where such activities are not desired or in such a manner as to encourage a failure of unanimous and concerted action by all people toward the common end of winning the war, and each and all such persons so found violating the law must be punished to the limit.

Now, let us see what that means and what happened under that opinion. That is an official opinion by the attorney general under a law not as severe, not anywhere near as arbitrary, as the law that the Senate passed placing this awful power in the hands of the Postmaster General.

The attorney general says in that official opinion that if you are engaged in the organization of a new political party you are liable to go to the penitentiary for 20 years. If you are engaged in organizing clubs or societies that have any other object except to win the war you may go there. You may be organizing a church society or something kindred to that.

Now, in that State there was some activity in the organization of nonpartisan leagues, and I hold no brief for them. But I do hold it is the right of every American citizen to join such an organization if the organization will admit him, and it is the right of every American citizen to engage in the organization of such societies if he desire. The Nonpartisan League is a political party—admittedly so. They had men out organizing nonpartisan leagues, and they were arrested under that law and that official opinion, because they were organizing a new political party. One in my county, in my home town, was arrested. I read a synopsis that was given by the newspapers of the evidence that was taken when he was arrested after that opinion was rendered.

The State started to prove that he was organizing a nonpartisan league, and he admitted it. He made no question of it. He said it was true he had been organizing such leagues. He admitted that he was engaged in the organization of nonpartisan leagues, and admitted that it was a new political party, and then they offered some of the literature of the Nonpartisan League, and that is all the evidence that was offered. Now, on his part he offered his own testimony, and from the synopsis of the evidence that was given in the newspapers it was undisputed and stood uncontradicted. He told what his age was. I have forgotten it, but it was over the draft age. He submitted to the court an honorable discharge from the United States, showing where he had served, I think, for five years in the Marine Corps. He was with Dewey at Manila. He fought through the entire Spanish-American War. He was in the first assaulting party that captured the land fortifications at Manila in that war. He received several medals for bravery, and, as he testified, lost his health while serving his country, so that he said he was not able to do manual labor.

The examining magistrate promptly bound him over, and unless somebody had gone on his bond he would have gone to jail to await the convening of the district court that would try him, and, if the law was held to be good, send him to the penitentiary for 20 years—all done by men moved by the highest feeling of patriotism, under a law that is not as severe as the law that the Senate has passed to control in times of peace.

You say, "The court ought not to have bound him over." I agree with you. You say, "He ought not to have been prosecuted." I agree with you; but he was. He was prosecuted; he was bound over; and he was not the only one. I do not know how many there were, but I know of quite a number that were bound over under that law and that official opinion. You say, "The opinion is wrong; that is not good law." I agree to that, but that is the trouble with laws of this kind. That has always been the trouble since we had the first spirit of human liberty in the dawn of civilization. It always will be. Men moved by a desire for power to suppress some one who is opposed to them or their political party or their religious sect or society will exercise the power that is given them for one purpose, perhaps a good purpose, for some other purpose.

You do not have to believe in the Nonpartisan League to condemn that kind of action. You may be opposed to it, and you have the power to crush out people of that kind, just like the New York Legislature had the power, in the case of the Socialists, and they used it. These things always come home to roost; and if you reverse operations and let the Nonpartisan League get on top and let them send us to jail, we, of course, will condemn such conduct, and condemn it rightly, but we will only be getting what we gave to them. If our doctrines are true and are founded upon the rock of truth, we ought not to be afraid to have them assailed. We will have no trouble in defending them in the open forum if they are right.

Mr. President, in my judgment bolshevism is the natural heir of autocracy. I do not see how anyone can read history and reach any other conclusion. You can not have a government like that which existed in Russia for centuries, with the poor people trampled, coerced, subdued, held in practical bondage for centuries, without having at some time, if the world progresses, the overthrow of that kind of a government. We always sympathized with them. Even when they went so far as to violate the law and commit murder they had a great deal of sympathy among free Americans. That never would have happened, we would not have had any bolshevik and soviet rule in Russia today, if it had not been for the tyranny by which those people were suppressed and held in bondage during the centuries that have gone.

It seems to me that I have given an illustration here that illustrates the danger of our passing any law that interferes in any way with the freedom of assemblage, freedom of speech, or the freedom of the press. Can any man read the official record without being amazed, without almost shuddering with fear for our own Government, if such things are to be continued by officials who are supposed to represent the people?

Let me repeat, it does not follow that they are not intending to do the best that they can do. I do not doubt but that this attorney general, when he wrote this official opinion I have read from, felt that he was doing his patriotic duty. He thought his party in power was able to conduct things better than anybody else, and he might have been right; but he wanted to suppress anybody who was going to organize another political party that might have a tendency to throw them out of power. He might have been right about that on the concrete proposition. I do not think he was, but he might have been; but the danger comes from a deeper seat. The danger comes from the precedent that is established, and that precedent in time will be used to overthrow the very government that makes that precedent. There is not any exception in the history of the world to that proposition.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to print at the conclusion of my remarks the entire opinion of the attorney general, so that anyone who desires to read it all may do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

USEFUL OCCUPATION—CLUBS AND SOCIETIES.

Persons engaged in the organization of clubs, leagues, societies, or associations which do not have for their object the furtherance of the progress of the war are not engaged in useful occupations.

Mr. R. M. JOYCE,
Chairman Nebraska State Council of Defense, Lincoln, Nebr.

DEAR SIR: You have asked my opinion as to the proper construction to be placed upon the words "useful occupation" in subdivision M, section 1, House roll No. 5, laws passed at the special session of the Nebraska Legislature and approved April 9, 1918, page 37, supplement to session laws of 1917.

It is the opinion that the construction to be placed on "useful occupation" varies somewhat under the circumstances of each case and the time and conditions of the country at the time of rendering the same. For instance, one might be engaged in an occupation which is useful, but by methods or manner of pursuing the occupation fail to make it useful, such as one engaged in lecture work who uses his opportunities, as a lecturer, to attempt to belittle the Government activities, or to disparage our form or system of government at this time. Such a person, while his occupation might be useful, in the first instance, fails to make its pursuit useful and thus, in my opinion, fails to be engaged in a "useful occupation."

The work attempted or performed must be something worth the while when viewed under existing conditions, since high pressure is on for assistance by each person physically able to work, and such work must not be frivolous or hurtful. (Williams Calk Co. v. Neverslip Manufacturing Co., 136 Fed., 210.)

In my opinion, all persons engaged in the organization of clubs, leagues, societies, or associations which do not have for their object the furtherance of the progress of the war are not engaged in a useful occupation. Any occupation which is instrumental in keeping alive existing military, commercial, or governmental activities is useful, but any occupation which has for its object, either directly or indirectly, the opposition to our present form or system of government, the creation of new political parties, the determination of economic questions not connected with the war, and many other acts and deeds too numerous to mention, are not useful occupations. There may be instances, as I have stated, where an occupation might be useful if properly followed, but becomes useless under the meaning of the act referred to, when attempted in communities where such activities are not desired, or in such a manner as to encourage a failure of unanimous and concerted action by all people toward the common end of winning the war, and each and all such persons so found violating the law must be punished to the limit.

Very respectfully,

WILLIS E. REED,
Attorney General.

JUNE 7, 1918.

Mr. STERLING. I sent to the desk, Mr. President, an editorial from this morning's Washington Post, which I asked might be read. I forego that and ask that it be printed following my remarks.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to beg the pardon of the Senator from South Dakota, for I did not know that he had asked to have the article read. I thought he had asked to have it printed.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, after every great war there is more or less hysteria throughout the world, and the idea of suppressing by force those who are advocating violence against the orderly processes of government is a very natural feeling, with which I sympathize. Certainly we ought not to permit the organization of anarchists and of Bolsheviki to use our country as a breeding place in which they can bring about by force or violence the destruction of the Government which we have established.

But, Mr. President, the bill which has been passed in the Senate has already become the opening wedge for the substitution of another bill much more drastic and much more capable of misconstruction than the bill which passed the Senate some days ago, Senate bill 3317. When that bill passed there were very few Senators in the Chamber. It was earnestly debated by several Senators who were opposed to it, and they spoke to empty seats, as I am doing now. But I think it is worth while to call the attention of the country, through the printed RECORD of the proceedings in the Senate, to some of the danger in this bill now proposed to be substituted for Senate bill 3317.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. OWEN. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator, interrupting the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], referred to a certain part of the House bill, but he did not read the language.

Mr. OWEN. I did read the language, but I am going to read it again.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish the Senator would read that objectionable language.

Mr. OWEN. The House bill is reported as House bill 11430, and is commonly known as the Graham bill. Without pausing to read that bill at this point, I want to submit for the RECORD a careful, analytical statement of that bill prepared by a very able Government servant. It speaks for itself, and by the arrangement of the words and phrases it makes it easy to understand how that bill can be subjected to misinterpretation, and how that bill can become and will become dangerous in the highest degree to the liberties of the people of this country, so that there would be hanging over the head of every man who desires free speech or freedom of the press the menace of some bureaucrat who could suddenly arrest, interfere with, and treat him as a criminal, with all the powers of this gigantic Government brought down upon the head of the little citizen, who would find it difficult to defend himself against an autocratic bureaucrat. I regard this bill now pending in the House as a bill dangerous in the extreme. I am not going to take the time of the Senate to go into any extended analysis of it, but I call attention to section 5, to which I alluded when the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] was speaking. The last three lines provide one of the things forbidden by this bill. The words "force or violence" are not used in qualifying this latter language. Here is the language which is forbidden:

To do anything that would tend to overthrow, change—

Observe the word "change"— or defeat the Constitution of the United States and the laws and authority thereof.

The advocacy of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States in favor of prohibition, which would be a change of the Constitution, would be a criminal act under this proposed law.

The advocacy of the change in the Constitution to establish an income tax would be a criminal act under this proposed statute.

The advocacy of the amendment proposing to give women suffrage in this country by a change of the Constitution would be a criminal act, and under this section to wear a button on the lapel of the coat that indicated the wearer was in favor of the woman suffrage amendment or the prohibition amendment would be a criminal act under this section.

Is it possible to draw a statute more loosely than that or more full of danger to the liberties of this country? I might cite many other things with regard to this proposed bill, which is proposed to be substituted for the bill which was passed through the Senate a short time ago.

I have here a comment made by Alfred Bettman, an able constitutional lawyer, during the war a special Assistant Attorney General of the United States, with offices in the Department of Justice, Washington, D. C., and in special charge of the sedition cases, commenting on the bill pending in the House proposed to be substituted for the bill passed by the Senate. He said:

"In response to your request for a legal opinion upon the sedition bill reported by the House Judiciary Committee, will state as follows:

"Under our constitutional system protection of private persons or property is reposed exclusively in the State governments. The Federal Government has no jurisdiction over such protection, nor can the alleged purposes for which acts of violence were committed against private persons or property be used to give jurisdiction to the Federal Government, for the reason that that would be punishing the purpose and not the acts. To punish the purpose would be contrary to all fundamental principles of American constitutional law. Therefore all the provisions of sections 2, 5, 9, 10, and 11, in so far as they relate to private persons or property, would be unconstitutional, since they are beyond the jurisdiction of the Federal Government."

We passed laws, under the excitement and hysteria of war, with a view to punishing the so-called Bolsheviks in this country; and I pause to say that in my judgment there are very few Bolsheviks in the United States. The atmosphere of the United States is not such as to encourage bolshevism. We have some citizens and some aliens who are grossly ignorant, painfully ignorant, of our laws, of our Constitution, of our great traditions of liberty and justice, law and order; poor, ignorant people, who, not understanding government, and feeling oppressed by the difficulty of making a living for themselves and their children, attribute it to the fault of government, and therefore are ready to raise their hands against the Government as an oppressor, not knowing, not understanding, the great difficulty of building up orderly processes of effective constitutional, democratic government. Those people, if they commit criminal acts, must be dealt with under the criminal code; but those people are more in need of instruction than they are in need of a statute such as this, whose provisions are so sweeping that no man would be safe in his liberties in this country if this bill should pass. I am opposed to Prussianizing the United States, and making this Government the instrumentality of brutal, autocratic, bureaucratic power. Liberty is what the world fought for, and not the suppression of liberty.

The stupid friends of vested interests, who would like to use the powers of the Government to put a bayonet through everyone who balks against vested interests, would be pursuing a policy like that of chaining down the escape valve on a steam boiler by such a policy as passing laws to suppress free speech and a free press. To do this under the false pretense of suppressing bolshevism and anarchy is Prussianism and not Americanism.

I do not want any bureaucrat in this Government having arbitrary power to lay a rough hand upon a man who is expressing his honest opinion and his belief as to what is the good thing and the better thing for his fellow citizens. It is freedom of opinion, it is freedom of speech, it is freedom of the press, it is freedom of religion and freedom of education which have combined to make this country the greatest free nation in the world, where the conditions of life are the best in the world, and where they will be better and better as the days come speedily on. Mr. Bettman, the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the sedition cases during the war, said also with regard to this bill pending in the House, referring to the unconstitutionality of the bill:

"The same is probably true of violence against a State government, because the only method provided in the Constitution for the protection of State governments against internal violence is the sending of Federal troops.

"The use of such words as 'suggested' and 'taught' in section 4 are dangerous to freedom of speech and contrary to American tradition.

"Penal laws should define crime with such exactitude that nothing is left to arbitrary decision or the prejudices of the court and the jury. Section 6 maintains a peace-time censorship contrary to the American principle, that this is a Government of law and not of men. It is also contrary to the fundamental Anglo-Saxon principle of liberty of speech and press, which is that there shall be no suppression in advance, but only responsibility after publication.

"Sections 9, 10, and 11 also violate the fundamental principle of American and Anglo-Saxon institutions, namely, that guilt is personal and not by association. If enacted, those sections would place upon American statute books a Prussian and czaristic Russian institution.

"Section 6 of the present Penal Code and other sections of that code cover every possible case of seditious conspiracy against the Government of the United States and every act of violence or resistance against the authority of the United States.

"I can not see clearly why there should be need for further legislation, unless it is desired to reach individual advocacy of violence against Federal officials or Federal property, which are not a part of any conspiracy. If so, such legislation should be carefully restricted to advocacy of violence against Federal officials or property, as is the language of the present seditious conspiracy section of the Federal Penal Code.

"The bill as reported by the House Judiciary Committee in respects, as above pointed out, goes beyond the constitutional bounds of the Federal jurisdiction and violates the fundamental principle of American and Anglo-Saxon civil liberties."

This is the opinion of Alfred Bettman, Assistant Attorney General of the United States, in charge of sedition cases during the war, an expert on sedition. He is opposed to the Graham bill for the reasons stated.

I call attention to existing law against those who may be inciting or encouraging any rebellion against the United States or its authority. The Penal Code, 1911 publication, chapter 1, provides:

OFFENSES AGAINST THE EXISTENCE OF THE GOVERNMENT.

It describes and punishes treason, misprision of treason, inciting or engaging in rebellion or insurrection, criminal correspondence, seditious conspiracy, and so forth, and section 4 says:

"Whoever incites, sets on foot, assists, or engages in any rebellion or insurrection against the authority of the United States or the laws thereof or gives aid or comfort thereto shall be imprisoned not more than 10 years or fined not more than $10,000, or both, and shall, moreover, be incapable of holding any office under the United States."

Section 6, dealing with seditious conspiracy, says:

"SEC. 6. If two or more persons in any State or Territory, or in any place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, conspire to overthrow, put down, or to destroy by force the Government of the United States, or to levy war against them, or to oppose by force the authority thereof, or by force to prevent, hinder, or delay the execution of any law of the United States, or by force to seize, take, or possess any property of the United States contrary to the authority thereof, they shall each be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than six years, or both."

Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD the analysis I present of the Graham bill pending, which has been prepared under the auspices of the Popular Government League, 637 Munsey Building, Washington, D. C.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. OWEN. I ask to have printed the House bill, H. R. 11430, immediately following the analysis, in order that the comparison may be shown.

There being no objection, the bill referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11430) to punish offenses against the existence of the Government of the United States, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That whoever incites, sets on foot, assists, or engages in any insurrection or rebellion against the United States or the authority or laws thereof, or whoever sets on foot or assists or engages in the use of force or violence, with intent to destroy or cause to be destroyed or change or cause to be changed or to overthrow or cause to be overthrown the Government of the United States, and the death of any person or persons is caused or results directly therefrom, shall be guilty of a felony, and on conviction shall be punished by death, or shall be imprisoned not more than 20 years or fined not more than $20,000, or both, and shall forever be debarred from holding office under the United States: Provided, however, That the death penalty shall not be imposed unless recommended in the verdict of the jury. SEC. 4. That no person shall write or knowingly print, publish, edit, issue, circulate, distribute, transport by express or otherwise, display, or sell any book, pamphlet, newspaper, document, handbill, poster, or printed, written, or pictorial matter of any kind or form wherein or whereby the overthrow or change of the Government of the United States or the Constitution, laws, and authority thereof by force or violence or by levying war against the same or by resistance to or rebellion against the execution of any law of the United States by force or violence is incited, suggested, taught, advocated, or advised.

SEC. 5. That no person shall display or exhibit at any meeting, or parade, or in any other place, any red flag or banner as a symbol of anarchy, or of any of the purposes forbidden in this act, and the display or exhibition of such flag or banner in any meeting or parade shall be prima facie evidence that it is so displayed and exhibited as such symbol, and no person shall display or exhibit at any meeting, gathering, or parade, or in any other public place, any flag, banner, emblem, picture, motto, or device which tends to incite or indicates a purpose to overthrow, by violence or by physical injury to person or property, the Government of the United States, or all government, or to overthrow, change, or defeat the Constitution of the United States and the laws and authority thereof.

SEC. 6. That every book, magazine, newspaper, document, handbill, poster, or written, pictorial, or printed matter, memorandum, sign, symbol, or communication of any form wherein or whereby the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force or violence, or resistance to or rebellion against the authority of the Government or the overthrow, change, or defeat of Constitution of the United States, or the laws or authority thereof by force or violence, is advocated, advised, or incited, or wherein or whereby the use of force or violence or physical injury to or the seizure or destruction of persons or property is advocated, advised, defended, or incited as a means toward the accomplishment of industrial, economic, social, or political change, or wherein or whereby an appeal is made to racial prejudice the intended or probable result of which appeal is to cause rioting or the resort to force and violence within the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, is hereby declared to be nonmailable, and the same shall not be deposited in any post office for mailing or be conveyed in the mails or delivered from any post office or by any letter carrier: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to authorize any person other than an employee of the Dead Letter Office, duly authorized thereto, or other person, upon a search warrant authorized by law, to open any letter not addressed to himself.

SEC. 10. defending said forbidden things against the person so giving, promising, or loaning anything of value as aforesaid.

And any citizen of the United States convicted under this act shall be forever debarred from voting thereafter and holding any office of profit, honor, or trust under the United States.

Mr. OWEN. I ask to have printed the statement of Mr. Alfred Bettman in its continuous form.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In response to your request for a legal opinion upon the sedition bill reported by the House Judiciary Committee, will state as follows:

Under our constitutional system protection of private persons or property is reposed exclusively in the State governments. The Federal Government has no jurisdiction over such protection, nor can the alleged purposes for which acts of violence were committed against private persons or property be used to give jurisdiction to the Federal Government, for the reason that that would be punishing the purpose and not the acts. To punish the purpose would be contrary to all fundamental principles of American constitutional law. Therefore all the provisions of sections 2, 5, 9, 10, and 11, in so far as they relate to private persons or property, would be unconstitutional, since they are beyond the jurisdiction of the Federal Government.

The same is probably true of violence against a State government, because the only method provided in the Constitution for the protection of State governments against internal violence is the sending of Federal troops.

The use of such words as "suggested" and "taught," in section 4, are dangerous to freedom of speech and contrary to American tradition.

Penal laws should define crime with such exactitude that nothing is left to arbitrary decision or the prejudices of the court and the jury. Section 6 maintains a peace-time censorship contrary to the American principle, that this is a Government of law and not of men. It is also contrary to the fundamental Anglo-Saxon principle of liberty of speech and press, which is that there shall be no suppression in advance, but only responsibility after publication.

Sections 9, 10, and 11 also violate the fundamental principle of American and Anglo-Saxon institutions; namely, that guilt is personal and not by association. If enacted those sections would place upon American statute books a Prussian and czaristic-Russian institution.

Section 6 of the present penal code, and other sections of that code, cover every possible case of seditious conspiracy against the Government of the United States, and every act of violence or resistance against the authority of the United States.

I can not see clearly why there should be need for further legislation, unless it is desired to reach individual advocacy of violence against Federal officials or Federal property, which are not a part of any conspiracy. If so, such legislation should be carefully restricted to advocacy of violence against Federal officials or property, as is the language of the present seditious conspiracy section of the Federal penal code.

The bill as reported by the House Judiciary Committee in respects, as above pointed out, goes beyond the constitutional bounds of the Federal jurisdiction and violates the fundamental principle of American and Anglo-Saxon civil liberties.

(Signed) ALFRED BETTMAN.

Mr. OWEN. I call attention to several other opinions which have been sent to me regarding this matter.

Prof. C. Chaffee, of the Harvard Law School, says:

This bill, if enacted, will be the first of its kind since the notorious sedition act of 1798, opposed by Marshall and denounced as unconstitutional by Jefferson and Madison. Without such laws this country has passed through much worse crises than the present.

Dr. Frederick C. Howe says:

This bill makes an end to freedom of the press in America. It invites the provocateur, espionage, and spying of all kinds.

Jackson H. Ralston, an eminent attorney of Washington, says:

Its language is so broad, its terms so indefinite, that no man can know what is criminal under it until Federal judges tell us what it means.

Mr. Samuel Gompers, representing as he does several million workmen, with their dependents amounting to millions of people more, is naturally concerned that this bill, under the color of protecting the Government against force and violence, shall not be used to suppress the rights of those who live and labor in this country to advocate a betterment of their own condition.

His loyalty ought not to be questioned. That man, when the world was shaken with war, stood like a rock and like a hero and marshalled the labor of this country to avoid strikes and use its utmost patriotic efforts in the making of munitions and to the rendering of those services without which the war could not have been won. No man ought ever to impute to him a lack of loyalty or a lack of patriotism. He deserves well of his country; he deserves the respect and affection of his country. He said, indeed, that—

Section 5 of the bill, unbelievable as it may seem—

Yes; "unbelievable as it may seem"— makes it a crime to wear in public any button of an organization whose purpose is to obtain an amendment to the Constitution of the United States or any existing Federal law.

Samuel Gompers says that; yes, he says it, and I say it, and the proposed bill says it. Look at that proposed statute. I have put it in the RECORD.

Mr. President, the liberties of the people of the United States comprise the most precious possession of the people of this Republic. It is upon liberty that the wisdom and the conscience and the patriotism of the mass of our citizens have been able, through their processes of education and of industry, to build up our great Republic with its wonderful powers. I should regard it as a national catastrophe if any act should be passed which would jeopardize those liberties or menace freedom of speech or the freedom of the press. I have often been disgusted and pained by the folly and falsehood of articles printed in the press, but folly passes and falsehood dies away, while the lessons of wisdom and truth which also daily come through the modern press remain and the world is enriched by their fruits.

Liberty—freedom—freedom of speech, of the press, of religion, of political opinion—freedom from the threats or menace of autocratic bureaucrats must be preserved if "the rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" are to be preserved.

AMERICANIZATION OF ALIENS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3315) to promote Americanization by providing for cooperation with the several States in the education of non-English-speaking persons and the assimilation of foreign-born residents, and for other purposes.

[Mr. KING resumed and concluded the speech begun by him yesterday. See Appendix.]

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have listened with sustained interest to the Senator's constitutional discussion of the bill. Everything has been said against our power to enact any such measure that can be offered, and I have no doubt that 50 years ago it would have been accepted as conclusive. Such an argument now, however, is addressed, no matter by whom, almost exclusively to the presiding officer and to an empty Senate. That fact indicates not only the loss of interest in constitutional questions but the uselessness of presenting them.

It is very difficult for a man to be even consistent in these days, however strong his ideas of State sovereignty may be, in casting his vote for or against the many measures that come up here for consideration. It is extremely difficult, in view of the constantly multiplying decisions of the courts, to determine what the line is, if line there be, between an act within our power to pass and one which is expressly or impliedly forbidden.

I have not the slightest doubt, notwithstanding my assent to much of the discussion in which the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has indulged, that the validity of this bill will be sustained by the Supreme Court if we should enact it into law and its validity should be challenged.

Some one said not more than 15 months ago that in these days of liberal construction anything was constitutional which the Congress determined to pass. While that expression was a semihumorous one, it contains a world of philosophy and much of truth.

When the insular decisions were handed down early in the century and Peter Finley Dunne was at the height of his popularity, he discussed those decisions in his remarkably keen and humorous way, and contended that they were entirely warranted because of practical conditions. When Hennessy asked him if he thought the Supreme Court followed the flag, he replied very promptly that he did not know, but he noticed it always followed the elections. He thus expressed what we know to be true, that public opinion influences judicial decision and action as it influences those of the executive and legislative departments. And public opinion, following the line of legislation ever since the close of the Civil War, has been favorable to liberal national legislation.

I believe that education is a subject the power over which was not delegated to the Federal Government. I know that the police power of the States was not so delegated; but the United States has built up a police power as the necessary offspring of affirmative legislation which has been recognized and sustained by the Supreme Court and its exercise is as common by Federal authority as by the States.

Under our prohibition acts, beginning with the Webb-Kenyon bill, the police power of the United States has been constantly invoked for the enforcement of their provisions. If in the days of Webster and his contemporaneous expounders of the Constitution any extreme Federalist had suggested the possibility of such conditions, he would have been regarded either as an enemy of his country or as a lunatic. But we have progressed since that day and the march is still toward the goal of unrestricted national authority. In my criticism of this bill I shall not therefore assume that it is unconstitutional, or that it will be so determined.

I think that there was much merit in the queries propounded yesterday by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] to the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], which had for their basis a contrast between the passage of the sedition bill and the Senator's objection to this one, the one being preventive in its character, the other being aimed at the repression of offenses against the Government. The Senator from Maryland, with much force, contended that the power to enact one involved the power to enact the other. But there is, I think, a very clear distinction between the two conditions. Those who advocate and practice the overthrow of the Federal Government by violence and insurrection must be dealt with by the Federal authorities. It is an inherent power in government, as it is a rule of action with individuals, that self-preservation is the first law of nature; and in the exercise of that power the Federal Government is in my judgment equipped with authority to enact the sedition bill, although my own judgment does not approve of its extremes, and I voted for it with great reluctance. The States are powerless to enact laws against what virtually amounts to treason against the Federal Government, and are equally powerless to enforce any laws of the Federal Government in that regard. On the other hand, they are the sole custodians of the power to legislate against conspiracies and combinations that are aimed at their destruction, unless it be that under the guaranty of a republican form of government to all the States the Federal Government shares in that authority.

But it does not follow because a government can protect itself that it has the power to enact such measures as may be necessary to prevent the occurrence of the dangers against which the repressive laws are aimed, because if we admit the existence of such a power we must accept its conclusions, and if, because the Federal Government may provide by repressive legislation against acts tending to its own destruction, it may also assume to educate the people so as to remove the contingency of such a menace, then it must follow that the General Government and not the State governments is clothed with the power to educate the people, and, having such authority, must exercise it. That, of course, would lead to the substitution of a Federal for our State systems of education and transfer the authority to enact laws upon that subject from the State capitals to Washington, thus centralizing an authority which, in my judgment, is peculiarly within the province of the States, and which I believe is essential to the preservation of the principle of local self-government, so that the difference, to my mind, seems to be a very clear one.

I know that the Congress have enacted laws regarding education. I know that many such laws are upon the statute books. There is a Bureau of Education in the Interior Department, presided over by a very capable and active gentleman. We are familiar with our vocational education schemes of legislation, which are in full force and which have been actively administered since their enactment. So that this is not pioneer legislation, but each of the measures to which I have referred is in itself a distinct step in the direction of ultimate control of the educational interests and faculties of the country by the General Government, and I think the Senator from Utah is absolutely correct when he defines this measure as a step toward the enactment of what is known as the Smith-Towner bill, designed to create a department of education, endow it with generous appropriations, and trust to it the duty of thereafter conducting the educational interests of the country to the exclusion of States either immediately or ultimately.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. I have such confidence in the Senator's judgment and wisdom that I want to ask him a question along the line he is discussing of the powers of the State and Federal Governments.

Suppose, if it is conceivable, that a State in the Union is teaching bolshevism in its schools, and the teachers are instructing the students that bolshevism is a desirable thing, and that the Russian soviet government is a preferable government to our Government, is the Federal Government perfectly helpless to meet such a situation in a State? Can not the Federal Government go into that State and establish schools and meet the doctrines that are being taught in the State schools to the citizenship of the State? They are still citizens of the Republic, and there is an interest in those citizens on the part of the Government just as well as upon the part of the State. And following that a little further, suppose the schools refused to teach American history or anything along the line of American ideals, but simply let the subject alone, would not the Federal Government have the right to go into the State and establish schools to teach the children of the State what the Federal Government really is, and what the history of this country is, and what its future offers?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have already said that I have no question but that if this measure is challenged in the courts its validity will be sustained. I have also mentioned a number of educational enactments the validity of which I do not question, but all of which are, in my judgment, leading up to the establishment of a national department of education. I will go further and say that, in my judgment, if we see fit to enact such a measure it will be sustained by the Supreme Court. I do not think it should be, but the trend is in the direction of centralization, and the line between what we may and may not do is becoming constantly more indistinct, if, indeed, it can even now be perceived.

Coming directly to the Senator's question, which I think presupposes an almost impossible situation, I may reply under the Constitution of the United States, in my judgment, the Congress could only justify its intervention in educational matters in such case upon the theory that it was bound under the Constitution to guarantee to the State a republican form of government, that such teachings inevitably tended to overthrow it, and in the discharge of its duty under that guaranty I am not prepared to place any limit, and particularly upon a supposititious question, to the extent to which the Government could go in the exercise of its power to preserve the States, and incidentally its own existence.

But let us suppose, Mr. President, that the teachings upon which the Senator's question is founded should be confined to one city only in a State. Would it not be the duty of the State to deal with the matter, and until the State refused to do so could the Federal Government take any action for the purpose of repressing that situation? I do not know. I am satisfied that the old principle of self-preservation would be applied somewhere, but I should prefer that the States themselves, or the particular State in which such an evil developed, true to its own convictions and to its traditions and conscious of the imperative duty of sustaining itself, should see to it that the evil was repressed, and I hope and believe that every State in the Union confronted by such a situation would so act.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado further yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. KENYON. Suppose the State did not do it?

Mr. THOMAS. I have said that if the State did not do it the Federal Government might justify its intervention upon that provision of the Constitution which guarantees to every State a republican form of government.

Mr. KENYON. Now, if the Senator will pardon me, and if it does not disturb the Senator——

Mr. THOMAS. No; it does not disturb me a particle.

Mr. KENYON. Take the situation at Gary, Ind. There is a town that is largely foreign. Matters became so bad in Gary that the Federal troops were put in there. Why did we not leave it to the State? Why not let the State handle that situation? What duty was it of the Federal Government to go in there?

Following that on, and I think logically, we come to the ignorance in Gary, the ignorance of our institutions, the reds, and the I. W. W.'s. Nearly every nationality had its meeting place and was prosperous except the American society, which died out. Now, we might say that the Government has nothing to do with that; but this doctrine that is falling in the States into these sore spots of illiteracy and ignorance is not directed against the States. It is directed against the Government. The Government, to protect itself and meet their arguments by the argument as to the better government that we possess, goes in and combats that, even in the States. The States are not as much interested as the Government. It is a doctrine directed toward the overthrow of the Government; and that, it seems to me, is another reason, just as in the situation where the soldiers are put into Gary. It is a national problem even more than a State problem.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, of course the Senator knows that Federal troops were thrown into Gary and other places because the executives of the States or others in authority requested them, and because under the Constitution of the United States the President must respond for the purpose of suppressing insurrection when the request is properly made. That power was also sustained in Debs's case upon a different theory, but resting upon specific constitutional authority. If a similar express authority existed in the Constitution regarding the education of the citizens of the States, or requiring the Government to contribute to educational purposes at the instance of the States, the analogy there would be complete; but we have no such provision, and I might remind the Senator that this bill recognizes the duty of the State rather than the Nation to carry on this educational program, because the appropriations are to be utilized by State authority and duplicated by State legislation before they become effective; and that, I think, is one of the best features of the bill, because it conforms to and recognizes the authority of the State to educate its people. What I think will result ultimately, however, will be to take it very largely out of the hands of the States and centralize it here, either in the present Bureau of Education or in some other of the various bureaus or in a new bureau to be created in the Department of the Interior.

But, Mr. President, I want to submit one or two observations regarding the remedy and its efficacy as here proposed for the evils of which we are all conscious and which the Senator from Iowa has so eloquently described.

There is no question about the value of education. It is a fundamental essential to free government. Free government is based upon the intelligence and morality and character of the individual, and character generally springs from enlightenment and education.

A State is composed of the sum of its units; and precisely as these units are advanced in thought, in intelligence, in morality, in all elements of enlightenment and progress, so will the State develop. But that is not universally true, since, if it were, all men of education and enlightenment would be good citizens. Unhappily, nearly all of the movements that are directed against society and have for their purpose the overthrow of governments and the plunder of society originate with, are directed by, and are intended to serve the ambitions of men of the highest education.

It is true that they find their most dangerous instruments in the benighted ignorance of the masses to whose cupidity and superstition and envy and lawlessness they can easily make the most successful appeals. Unfortunately, however, they capture many of the educated and enlist them as enthusiastic followers of the cause, converting them into evangelists of the same doctrine.

We might give a great many instances. The Senator came in contact with a good many during the investigation of the steel strike, and I know of my own knowledge that some of the originators and founders of the society of the I. W. W. were among the best educated men in the country.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. STANLEY. I do not like to interrupt, but I wish to hear the Senator, who usually analyzes things from the bottom, upon this proposition.

It appears to me that this character of legislation is aimed at the ethical rather than the intellectual upbuilding of the citizen; and, if that be true, the source of ethical training is to a great extent religious. Your schools are necessarily nonsectarian. I do not see how you can reach the ethical side of the citizen simply by control of the curricula of the schools.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the object of the bill is to arouse the ethical through the educational. Of course, there is a fundamental difference between education and ethics, between intelligence and religion, between morality and law; but fundamentally intelligence and education must be the basis of all human progress. No man denies that proposition.

But we do know that as an effective agency for curing the ills of society—moral, social, economic, and political—something more than education is needed. Hence the fundamental postulate of this bill, while most excellent in its character, will prove to be largely inefficacious, no matter how much money we spend upon a scheme of Federal education.

Suppose that as a result of this appropriation, and through the teaching of those who are its intended beneficiaries 200 hours every year, a good working knowledge of the English language and of the fundamentals of American Government is instilled into these 8,000,000 illiterates. Will that eradicate from society what we call Bolshevism, anarchy, and the other political ills? Will it of itself prove the remedy which is assumed for it? As I understand the theory of the bill, the fundamental premise is that ignorance is the cause of all political, moral, and social ills; there are 8,000,000 ignorant people in the United States; therefore they are the cause of this condition, and therefore the cause must be eliminated.

While I favor that, while I believe that we should eradicate ignorance from the human mind wherever the Stars and Stripes float, we must resort to other and far more essential aids in the accomplishment of the great purpose sought to be subserved by the bill. Education is but an adjunct to other remedies more potent, and I think more essential, than education, however extensive its operation.

I believe that the application of a general understanding, a human sympathy, a spirit of helpfulness between the well-to-do and the laboring masses, the educated and the ignorant elements, of the United States; the constant expression by contact and discussion of a desire to minister to the welfare, to benefit the condition, to remove the many obstacles to the advancement of material well-being, to carry home to every benighted individual a practical application of the principle of the golden rule, will do more to promote a sense of satisfaction, to arouse an interest in and an affection for the Government of the United States, a respect for personal and property rights, and a spirit of mutual tolerance than all the schemes of education under the sun. That is something that we can not legislate upon; that must be the spontaneous action of the individual, alive to a sense of civic duty and to the need for his interest in the welfare and advancement of his fellow men.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I would just like to ask the Senator what suggestion he has to offer as to the manner of teaching the principles of the golden rule to those people who do not understand the English language?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the humanities are confined to no language. A man may teach by example and his purpose will be recognized by men and women, however low their intelligence. Of course, the more intellectual the individual may be, the higher his appreciation of what may be called the human touch. I am not arguing against the teaching of the English language; on the contrary, I believe that it is the duty of every State to provide for the compulsory teaching of English to every citizen and to eliminate the teaching of any other language, except as selective courses may be suggested. I am in hearty sympathy with that. But I affirm that, so far as the teaching of the English language is concerned, and the power to read and write, the States may conduct it, if a better citizenship is desired, in conjunction with an aroused public sentiment founded upon the dependence of all men upon each other, that mutual help and sympathy are the eternal essentials to peace, order, liberty, and substantial progress.

Mr. President, this may sound very much like the abstract sentiment of some visionary humanitarian. But wherever employer and employee have applied it and recognized it we have industrial peace; and as it shall hereafter be recognized and applied, so will there be industrial peace. In all of the conflicts immediately before and during and since the war between labor and capital no element except those of hate, animosity, and antagonism has developed. Capital and labor to-day are in armed camps, as it were, and many elements of labor proclaim, as they have proclaimed for years, a class distinction between capital and labor which can not be bridged, and which must continue until the one or the other shall prevail by force of arms.

A people thus divided can not prosper. A nation thus divided will remain divided, if we rely only upon education to remove the barrier. Hence, I have considerable question as to the practical effect of this measure, which I fear will result in disappointment before it has been in force for a year, unless it is fortified by the substitution of negotiation and mutual understanding for the bitter resentments of the hour.

Let me illustrate what I am endeavoring to demonstrate by referring briefly to the negro population of the country. The charts which are displayed here show a decided decrease in the illiteracy of the negro population during the past 30 years, quite a remarkable and in some respects a most creditable situation. But is the educated negro to-day any better citizen than the uneducated negro? Is the denial of justice to him founded upon any distinction between the educated and the uneducated negro? Among the 78 lynchings of the year 1919, 72 were of negroes. Some were shot, some were hung, some were burned. One or two white men and a few Mexicans shared the same fate. The offenses charged were of many sorts and grades. Some were educated; some were illiterate. A great many believe that the better educated the black man is the more dangerous he becomes to society. I do not admit that by any means. But I do affirm, Mr. President, that we may educate, and highly educate, every black man in the United States, yet if we persist in denying him justice, in refusing him the benefit of trial by jury, in barring him from those constitutional safeguards which are the glory of the Anglo-Saxon, he will bitterly resent the wrong, his animosity to the institutions of the country will grow with the flight of time, and the sense of his wrongs may flame into rebellion.

I want to see him educated. I cast no reflections upon any section. My theme concerns every portion of the United States—Chicago, East St. Louis, the North, the South, and the West—when I say that every citizen, I care not what his color or nativity, who is required to pay taxes, support the laws of the country, submit to conscription, wear the national uniform, and offer his life in defense of our institutions, must enjoy the benefit and security of those protective laws which are the heritage of every man and woman in the land. These guaranteed, the tendency of a race to Bolshevism and insurrection will not only be circumscribed but terminated. I repeat, we must resort to other methods than education, we must mete out even-handed justice to all men, substitute sympathy and due consideration for the colder processes of give and take, if we are to remove the perils menacing our future.

Edmund Burke once said that the basis of all civil society is justice, and any country which denied or ignored that principle labored under the implication of having no civic policy at all. That is fundamentally true, and justice—equal, impartial, and unfailing—to all the sons of men is and must be a fundamental to the continuance of civil liberty and to the integrity of American institutions.

I am glad to know that in some sections of the country, particularly, Mr. President [Mr. OVERMAN in the chair], in the State from which you hail, the need for the enforcement of the law is materializing in the determination of your splendid governor. He has sounded the call for the punishment of murderers under the forms of lynch law, with a vigorous public sentiment behind him. He is determined to enforce the laws and maintain the institutions of North Carolina. He is vindicating his right to the great office he holds by giving to all men the equal protection of the laws. God grant that his example may be recognized and followed throughout the country. He realizes that illiterates must have something more than education; they must possess a feeling of security under the law, which can only come when they may appeal to it in the full confidence that they will not have appealed in vain.

We have made a great many appropriations heretofore for the education of the Indians, Mr. President. I do not know how many millions of dollars have been taken from the Treasury of the United States for that purpose. My friend from New Mexico is more familiar with the beneficial results of these appropriations than am I; but I am inclined to think that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] included in his charts here the Indians of the West, the tribes who are still the wards of the Government; and my impression is that the money which we have appropriated and expended for their education has not produced much benefit up to this time, though I do not know. But why, if among the illiterates are included the Indians of the country, should we duplicate our scheme of Indian education, as this bill will do? Why should it be necessary, whether the money expended for that purpose has effectuated their education or not? I am afraid that the bill contains an element of duplication, which is the vice of too much of the legislation of Congress.

There is a practical way, too, of educating the alien, which I would like to see adopted. I can better describe the plan, Mr. President, by referring to an incident that occurred before the Capitol last September. There assembled one September morning last year a platoon of about 28 or 30 men. They wore the uniform of the American Army, and were put through the manual of arms by their commanding officer. I never saw a more perfect drill in my life. Every command that was given was repeated by each private soldier, who then executed it with a precision and a perfection that was positively amazing.

On the 1st of July of last year not a man of that platoon could read or write the English language. They were enlisted into the American Army and submitted to a special course of training, with the result that they had developed into splendid specimens of manhood, and they represented almost as many nationalities as there were men. And they had mastered the English tongue.

I conversed with half a dozen of them and each spoke the English language intelligibly and well. Each believed this to be the greatest of all Governments, because it had reached out its hand to them, given them an opportunity to enlist in the Army, and had then spent its money and its time in transforming them from raw material into finished American citizens.

Such an experience to the individual, in my judgment, is worth more than any school in Christendom, because it combines physical, patriotic, and mental development in the mass as well as in the individual and turns out units of citizenship equal in nearly all respects to the native article and superior to many of its individual specimens. I should like to see something of that kind engrafted upon the pending bill. There is a bill upon the calendar now authorizing the Army to take enlistment of aliens for the purpose of education. I hope it will become the law.

Mr. President, I have occupied more time than I intended and said some things which are perhaps not entirely germane to the bill. I shall probably vote for it. I have not yet determined that, but I have such a high opinion of the capacity and high purposes of my distinguished friend the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], whose whole being is wrapped in a desire to serve his country at this critical time, and who has done as much to focus public attention upon the evils threatening the body politic as any man in this Chamber, that I hesitate to bring myself to a point of active opposition to a bill which he has carefully formulated and which he believes to be so essential to the public needs.

Yet I must warn the Senator that he must not expect too much from his measure. It is merely an abstract scheme of education. While it may enlighten the minds of many of our benighted fellow citizens, it may not improve their civic and individual morality or alter their conceptions of the character and the genius of American government.

AWARDS OF NAVAL DECORATIONS.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, out of order, to submit a resolution and that the same be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 285) was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That the resolution of the Senate No. 62, agreed to June 6, 1919, authorizing the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate, or any subcommittee thereof, to send for persons, books and papers, to administer oaths, and to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be before said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and the same is hereby, amended to authorize and empower the subcommittee appointed to consider the question of awards in the Navy to employ such counsel and clerical assistants as it may deem necessary, the expense thereof to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to report back favorably from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate the resolution just read, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to the request of the Senator from New York for the present consideration of the resolution just read?

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr JONES of Washington. I wish to ask what is the necessity for counsel in connection with the inquiry?

Mr. THOMAS. So do I.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not believe there is any.

Mr. KING. That is the question I rose to ask.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, there is a great deal of work that will have to be done in connection with the investigation. We already have found that we have not clerical assistance enough to take care of the work, and we want, further, to go fully into all the testimony and have the records examined. We believe that a lawyer is necessary to help us out. It is a matter of very great importance and we do not think without such help we can make a proper investigation. I might say that we have talked the matter over in the subcommittee, and the full subcommittee consented to the resolution which I have submitted. I hope very much that the Senate will allow us what we ask for.

Mr. LODGE. If I may ask a question of the Senator, the matter was brought up in the full Committee on Naval Affairs?

Mr. HALE. The matter was brought up first before the full committee.

Mr. LODGE. I understood then that the purpose in having counsel was not to have him conduct the investigation.

Mr. HALE. Counsel is not in any way to conduct the investigation. The understanding has been had with other members of the subcommittee that he shall not ask questions in the meetings of the subcommittee, but simply shall do research work and other work that we require to have done.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I was present at the meeting of the Committee on Naval Affairs and it was distinctly understood at that time that there should be no counsel, but the committee was willing to consent to a clerk for the purpose of arranging and filing papers and getting data from the department. Counsel means a large fee; it means necessarily the employment of an attorney.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I shall object if the word "counsel" is insisted upon.

Mr. PHELAN. I do not object to its consideration, but I move to insert the word "clerk" instead of the word "counsel."

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will withdraw my objection in order to give the Senate an opportunity to consider an amendment of that sort. I am heartily in favor of the employment of clerical force.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I shall not object to the consideration of the resolution, but if counsel is not desired for conducting examinations, in my judgment no counsel is necessary, because the formulation of testimony and its examination can be done by an experienced clerk and is not so important as that which requires the services of an attorney.

We are paying out enormous quantities of money for these investigations, and they are multiplying. We are becoming a sort of a collective grand jury, subdivided into committees. I do not know how much has been expended so far nor how much will be expended. Neither am I opposed to this investigation. On the contrary, I want to see it proceed, but I do not believe that we should incur any unnecessary expense. There are a number of lawyers upon the committee, able lawyers, distinguished lawyers, and of course they can conduct the examinations. In my judgment it is perfectly easy for clerical assistants to make all the abstracts of testimony that may be necessary.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I did not understand the opinion of the full committee as the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] did. I understood the action of the full committee to be that the matter of employing assistants was to be left to the subcommittee. It was then also understood that there was to be no counsel to conduct examinations; that those were to be conducted by the committee itself. What the subcommittee needs is assistants. It was started with the duty of examining the question of the awards of medals on Admiral Sims's statement, which appeared in the newspapers. It has now been extended to the letter which was introduced by him in the nature of a report to the department, which practically reviews a large part of the conduct of the war by the Navy. That is a very large subject, and it is impossible for the subcommittee to do all the work that is necessary and go over all the material that will be presented. If the clerk whom they employ happens to be a young lawyer it will be beneficial, and it seems to me that they ought to have such clerical assistants as they need.

Mr. KING. I was present at the committee meeting when the matter was taken up for consideration. My recollection of the proceedings is somewhat different from the recollection of the Senator from Massachusetts. As I understood the Senator from Maine, he desired counsel to be employed in the first investigation, namely, that relating to awards.

Mr. HALE. No; the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. LODGE. He never asked for that.

Mr. HALE. I never asked for that. The resolution refers to the committee as the committee that was appointed to consider the question of awards. That was simply so that we could designate a special subcommittee, but the powers of the subcommittee have now been enlarged. The same committee still exists, but the powers have been increased.

Mr. McCORMICK. Its responsibilities have been increased.

Mr. KING. If Senators will allow me to complete my statement, at any rate, it was my understanding that the Senator from Maine desired counsel and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] objected. My recollection is that it was understood that with respect to the work involved in investigating the awards no counsel was to be procured, but after the subcommittee made its findings upon the awards in investigating the charges of Admiral Sims with respect to these other matters, they should consider the question among themselves as to whether counsel was required and report to the full committee or to the Senate and make such requests as they deemed proper. If this request deals only with the work of investigating the charges made by Admiral Sims last——

Mr. HALE. That is entirely the purpose of the resolution.

Mr. KING. I agree the question was left to the subcommittee to determine what they should do and then they would report back to the full committee or to the Senate.

Mr. HALE. The committee had a meeting to-day and unanimously agreed to the resolution.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] at that time said he was much opposed to any counsel.

Mr. HALE. But that Senator has withdrawn his objection.

Mr. KING. Of course, if the subcommittee feel that any counsel is needed, I shall not object, although I think it is an unnecessary expense. What they need is a competent clerk, who could go through the documents referred to and compile such data as is required. I am sure a clerk of that character would be worth more than two or three lawyers.

I agree with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] that if a lawyer is not to do the examining of witnesses they do not need him at all. They need a competent clerk, familiar with the collection of data or assorting of data, and he would be very much better and serve the committee with very much more ability than any lawyer who might be selected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. PHELAN. I have made a motion to amend by striking out the words "counsel and" before the words "clerical assistants."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from California.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I make the point of no quorum before that is voted on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brandegee	Jones, Wash.	Newberry	Sutherland
Calder	Kenyon	Overman	Thomas
Gerry	King	Phelan	Townsend
Hale	Kirby	Pomerene	Underwood
Harris	Lodge	Robinson	Warren
Jones, N. Mex.	McCormick	Sheppard

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] are absent from the Senate on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Twenty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. THOMAS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 17 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 21, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 20, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

How strange and how manifold, dear Lord, are the mysteries of life!

Behold! we know not anything;
We can but trust that good shall fall
At last—far off—at last, to all,
And every winter change to spring.

But what if every act committed is registered on the delicate tissues of the soul, and when we shall shuffle off this mortal coil and stand in the light of purity, we shall be our own judge and know ourselves as we are known and by the natural force of gravitation find the place we have made for ourselves and be permitted by the mercy of God to begin again and rid ourselves of selfishness, vain desires and sordid sins; and when at last, we shall have developed a perfect character we shall hear the angels around the throne singing, "Glory to God in the highest"; and hear the words sweeter than all music: "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RATIFICATION OF SUFFRAGE AMENDMENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the secretary of state of Indiana, announcing the ratification by the legislature of that State of the proposed amendment to the Constitution extending the right of suffrage to women.

MEMBERS OF JOINT COMMISSION TO VISIT VIRGIN ISLANDS.

The SPEAKER, in pursuance of House concurrent resolution No. 46, announced the appointment of the following members of the joint committee to visit the Virgin Islands: Mr. TOWNER, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, and Mr. GARRETT.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a short resolution by the Robley D. Evans Post, No. 4, American Legion, indorsing the bill H. R. 11665, the naval pay bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I object, Mr. Speaker.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KING. I received a very important telegram this morning, of interest to all the Members of the House, and for that reason I send it to the Clerk's desk and ask that it be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read a portion of the telegram, as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL., January 19, 1920.

Hon. EDWARD J. KING,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

In view of present industrial unrest and general labor situation, serious consideration of Sterling or Graham measures would be grave mistake——

Mr. BLANTON (interrupting the reading). Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Has not the minute expired?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. BLANTON. The minute has not expired?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the reading of the telegram. The gentleman asked for only one minute. He did not ask that a telegram be read.

Mr. KING. This is not being taken out of my time, is it, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Of course not.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of order that under the gentleman's request that he might proceed for one minute he did not ask to read a telegram of this nature, and I object to the reading of it.

The SPEAKER. It can only be read by the Clerk by unanimous consent.

Mr. BLANTON. I object to the reading of the telegram or its going into the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, there is still a quarter of a minute left?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I object to the gentleman reading it in his time.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I object to the interruption on the part of the gentleman from Texas. I have not yielded to him.

The SPEAKER. At the first blush, the Chair's recollection is that a Member can not read without consent of the House.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will permit, there is a rule on that. No one can read anything before the House that the House has to vote on unless the House so decides, which must be decided without debate.

Mr. BLANTON. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING] be permitted to read the telegram.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. NOLAN. Oh, no. That motion is in order, under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The Chair thinks it can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. NOLAN. The motion is in order, under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. NOLAN. That question was decided, Mr. Speaker, in relation to a letter I sought to read here on September 16 last, when objection was made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. A motion prevailed that I be permitted to read that letter under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct. The rule says:

When the reading of a paper other than one upon which the House is called to give a final vote is demanded, and the same is objected to by any Member, it shall be determined without debate by a vote of the House.

The gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] moves that the gentleman be allowed to read the telegram. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from California.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask recognition to oppose the motion.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 91, noes 1.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum. I think the House ought to go on record on this.

The SPEAKER. Evidently no quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors and the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees. All in favor of the motion of the gentleman from California will, as their names are called, answer "yea," those opposed will answer "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 303, nays 2, answered "present" 1, not voting 122, as follows:

YEAS—303.

Mr. BLANTON. How much time, Mr. Speaker, has he?

The SPEAKER. He has 20 seconds.

Mr. KING. I read:

CHICAGO, ILL., January 19, 1920.

Hon. EDWARD J. KING,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

In view of present industrial unrest and general labor situation, serious consideration of Sterling or Graham measures would be grave mistake.

Mr BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. I submit that the 20 seconds are up.

Mr. KING (continuing reading):

Passage of these bills will intensify an already delicate situation. Postmaster General Burleson already exercising undue authority in censorship of newspapers and publications.

The SPEAKER. The 20 seconds were not up when the gentleman from Texas rose. They are up now.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. JACOWAY (at the request of Mr. TILLMAN), for two days, on account of sickness.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia (at the request of Mr. BLAND of Virginia), for the day, on account of sickness.

FINAL REPORT OF GEN. PERSHING.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I move to take from the Speaker's table House concurrent resolution 40, providing for the printing of additional copies of Gen. Pershing's final report, with amendments of the Senate, and move to concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to take from the Speaker's table House concurrent resolution No. 40, with Senate amendments, and to concur in the Senate amendments. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 40.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the final report of Gen. John J. Pershing, commander in chief of American Expeditionary Forces, be printed as a House document, without the accompanying maps and charts, and that 100,000 additional copies be printed, of which 30,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 70,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I will explain briefly to the House the amendments made by the Senate.

You will remember that at the time we passed this resolution we provided for 100,000 copies without maps, at a cost of $4,212.71. At that time we had no estimate as to the cost with maps. Later the Government Printing Office advised that the cost for 100,000 copies with maps would be approximately $47,000, but by reducing the size of the maps and using the facilities of the Geological Survey Bureau for map printing it was found that 50,000 copies could be printed for approximately $10,000. The Senate has amended the bill to read "50,000 copies, 35,000 copies for the House and 15,000 for the Senate," and this will give each Member of Congress about 80 copies.

I move to concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to concur in the Senate amendments. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the river and harbor appropriation bill, H. R. 11892. Pending that motion I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be limited to three hours, one half the time to be controlled by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] and the other half by myself.

Mr. SMALL. Will the gentleman yield to me to make a request for unanimous consent?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. SMALL. I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed five legislative days in which to file a minority report on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that he may have five legislative days in which to file a minority report on this bill. Is there objection?

Mr. BARKLEY. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina what object can be served in filing a minority report in five days when this bill is scheduled to be railroaded through to-day?

Mr. SMALL. Simply to have a record of the views of those who sign the minority report. This bill was reported by the committee only yesterday afternoon. There has been no opportunity to present a minority report.

Mr. BARKLEY. In that case I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. TILSON. Reserving the right to object, is it not the usual form to make it a statement of the views of the minority, rather than a minority report?

Mr. SMALL. Yes. I yield to the suggestion of my friend, and ask leave for five legislative days in which to file the views of the minority?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman that he have five legislative days in which to file the views of the minority?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENNEDY]?

Mr. SMALL. I ask unanimous consent to interrupt the gentleman by proceeding for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. JUUL. With the understanding that it is with reference to the request of the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

The SPEAKER. The Chair assumed that it was on that point that the gentleman from North Carolina wished to address the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I hope that the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and that the leaders of the House will not insist upon this bill being taken up to-day. The committee were proceeding with the consideration of the bill in the usual manner and endeavoring to economize in every possible way. There was cooperation between all the members of the committee to that end. On yesterday the gentleman now addressing the House heard for the first time the suggestion that the entire character of the bill be changed and that a lump-sum appropriation be made, and the majority of the committee so decided. In view of this sudden change of policy, no time has been afforded to study the bill or for gentlemen to prepare their remarks or to prepare a statement of the views of the minority. The suggestion is made that we carry this over for a day or two, until Friday, for instance, or, if nothing better, until Thursday, to-morrow being Calendar Wednesday, and I hope that the chairman of the committee, with the consent of the leaders of the House, will agree not to press this motion to-day to go into Committee of the Whole, but will postpone it, say, until Friday of this week.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the request for unanimous consent as to the time of debate. Is there objection?

Mr. SMALL. Then, Mr. Speaker, upon that I desire also to make a suggestion. The demand for time on this side is for more than two hours. I think, therefore, the general debate ought to continue for at least four hours and that the debate be confined to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object to the request?

Mr. SMALL. I should like, if possible, to secure an agreement. I think the chairman of the committee will not be averse to that.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I have no desire to curtail general debate, but I should like to finish this bill to-day. I have requests for about an hour and a half of time on this side, and I thought we might be able to get through in three hours; but if the gentleman has requests for more than that time, I will agree to fix the general debate at four hours.

Mr. SMALL. Now, will the gentleman modify his request so as to confine the debate to the bill?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I do not think we could do that over here.

Mr. KITCHIN. We can confine our debate on this side to the bill.

Mr. SMALL. We are willing to confine ourselves to the bill on this side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa modifies his request and asks unanimous consent that the debate be limited to four hours, half the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENNEDY] and half by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDERSON. I should like to ask the gentleman from Iowa if after the four hours general debate he intends to insist on the passage of the bill to-day?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. We want to try to pass it to-day.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11892) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, with Mr. HUSTED in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the bill by title.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to have the bill read.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for general debate on this bill has been fixed by the House at four hours, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENNEDY] and one-half by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL], the debate not to be confined to the bill. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENNEDY] for two hours.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, my statement is quite brief, and I desire not to be interrupted.

Mr. Chairman, the bill we are now considering is the smallest bill that has been reported by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors since the policy of annual bills was adopted some 10 years ago. It carries in the aggregate $12,400,000, and, based on the present cost of doing work, is less than 30 per cent of the average amount carried in the annual bills reported to the House. The original estimates for improvement and maintenance work for the next fiscal year, or rather until March 4, 1921, when the appropriations in the next bill should become available, amounted to $42,841,000. The revised estimates were about $25,000,000. Eight hundred and seventeen thousand dollars previously authorized is requested of the Appropriations Committee, and no doubt will be carried in the next sundry civil bill. In addition to cash estimates, continuing contracts were asked in the sum of $2,223,000.

The Committee on Rivers and Harbors spent many days carefully going through the estimates, having in mind a deficit of $3,000,000,000 at the end of the next fiscal year, and the necessity of cutting them where reduction might be made without injury to commerce. We believe that the bill we have reported, providing for $5,000,000 for maintenance and $7,000,000 for improvement work, will meet every need of commerce for the period between now and March 4, 1921. I may say in this connection that the Engineers do not observe the fiscal year in making up estimates or in the expenditure of funds provided in river and harbor acts. It should be understood that the estimates for this bill were to carry the work to March 4, 1921, when the appropriations carried in the next bill will become available.

In preparing this bill the committee has departed from the policy followed in the past of appropriating separately for maintenance in each case where an amount for maintenance was asked. We are providing in this bill a lump sum to do maintenance work covering all estimates for maintenance that were submitted to the committee. It is not to be understood that the policy followed in this bill is to be considered the permanent policy of the committee or of Congress. Most of us believe that a lump-sum policy for maintenance will work satisfactorily. It has been urgently recommended by Col. Taylor, the Assistant Chief of Engineers in charge of river and harbor work. The objections that have been raised to lump-sum appropriations do not hold good in this case, for the money can be used only for one purpose—the maintenance of existing river and harbor works. If the policy meets our expectations and proves satisfactory, it will no doubt be followed in the preparation of bills in the future. If, on the other hand, it does not work out satisfactorily, the committee will, I believe, return to the old plan of appropriating separately for the maintenance of each project.

It may be well to call attention to the manner of making up the estimates for maintenance. The district officers are called upon at the end of the fiscal year to estimate the amount they will need to maintain projects in their districts for the period beginning a year after the time the estimate is made and ending two years from that date. To what extent maintenance may be needed depends on storms and floods. No one can tell when a storm will visit a locality and do great damage to such works as dams, jetties, breakwaters, and piers. Such a storm on the Great Lakes and another on the Gulf did much damage to such works the past summer. Then, again, rivers form bars after periods of high water, and the amount required for maintenance during a year will depend largely on whether there has been high-water stages in the rivers. A concrete case will serve to illustrate how the policy of appropriating separately for maintenance of each project works out. At Los Angeles severe storms occur on an average of every four or five years. When such a storm does come it carries silt and fills the inner harbor to such an extent that it costs the Government around $100,000 to remove it from the channel. The district officer called upon to estimate for the maintenance of this project can not tell when such a storm will come, and as a result he must keep on hand a sufficient balance to dredge the harbor whether the storm occurs this year or next; in fact, it may not occur for several years. The policy results in piling up balances in maintenance funds that in many cases are not needed and not used for the work for which they were provided.

A lump sum for maintenance should work out differently. The Chief of Engineers will allot from the lump sum from time to time such amounts as the district officer can show are needed for immediate work of maintenance. Under such a policy maintenance balances will not accumulate as they have in the past. On November 1, 1919, there were some $12,000,000 in the various project funds of the country that had been appropriated for maintenance work.

In order that we may know how the funds provided in this lump sum are used we provide that the Secretary of War shall report to Congress at the beginning of the next session of Congress, showing the amounts allotted under this lump-sum appropriation for works of maintenance. Personally, I believe it will prove to be more satisfactory and much more economical than the old policy of separate appropriations. The total amount of original estimates for improvement work carried in this bill amounted to $33,481,215. In lieu of the estimates we propose to appropriate a lump sum of $7,000,000, which we think is all that is needed for improvement work up to March 4, 1921. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors has no intention in the future of making appropriations for improvement work in lump sums. The only reason we carry a lump-sum appropriation in this bill is because of the large balances to the credit of the various projects for which appropriations are asked, which we believe to be sufficient in nearly every case to carry on the work until additional funds are provided in the next bill. The amount we carry is more in the nature of an emergency fund to be used in case it is found some additional money is necessary for a particular project. Under the policy followed by the Engineers in estimating for improvement work it is highly important that the committee pass on the estimates with a view to keeping appropriations down to an amount actually needed for work to properly accommodate the commerce of the country. When we adopt a project for the improvement of a river or harbor, the Engineers conceive it to be their duty, and properly so I think, to recommend the appropriation of such sums from time to time as will complete the project economically and without unnecessary delay. That policy is followed by the Engineers regardless of whether the existing channel is adequate to accommodate the commerce that uses it. With the Engineers following such a policy, estimates for appropriations are in many cases made where additional work is not needed in the interest of commerce, and the only basis for asking additional appropriations is that the project adopted should be completed. I for one can see no reason why we should proceed to complete a project where the existing facilities are all that are needed for commerce.

A few weeks ago I received a newspaper clipping through the mail calling attention to the immediate need for deepening the harbors of the country to provide an adequate depth to accommodate the vessels that were being turned out by the Shipping Board. Many people have the idea the Shipping Board is building many deep-draft vessels. The fact is that up until recently they had constructed no vessels that would draw more than 26 feet on full draft. They have, up to the present time, constructed very few ships of deeper draft than 26 feet, none of which would have trouble in navigating the channels in the 20 principal harbors of the country at the present time. The fact is that if we maintain the present channels in the harbors of the country, according to the Engineers, they will provide sufficient depths to accommodate all the vessels that use the ports. This condition has been brought about by the liberal policy followed by Congress in the past with respect to the improvement of the harbors of the country. In 1916 there were but seven harbors in the world with a mean low-water depth of 35 feet, and all seven of those were our harbors. The great port of Liverpool that ranks high among the ports of the world in the amount of commerce handled has but 32 feet over the bar at mean low water, and the enormous tonnage that reaches Manchester is carried through a canal with a 28-foot depth. According to the Shipping Board there were only 45 ships built between 1859 and 1918 and drew more than 34.1 feet when fully loaded. The Engineers' report for the last year shows that but three vessels entered New York Harbor drawing over 35 feet. It seems to me that the channels at the present time are adequate to accommodate the commerce.

It may be asked how the works of improvement and maintenance can be carried on until March 4, 1921, with an appropriation of $12,000,000. The answer to that is this: The amount expended the last fiscal year for both improvement and maintenance on the 50 projects for which appropriations were asked under the revised estimates was $12,421,364.43.

The average amount expended on these same 50 projects for the past five years for both improvement and maintenance was $14,453,463. The amount of unexpended balances on hand to the credit of these same 50 projects on November 1, 1919, was $25,189,000, or more than twice the sum expended on them the past fiscal year. Now, we propose to augment this sum by $7,000,000, which will make a total that can be expended for work on these same 50 projects between November 1, 1919, and March 4, 1921, of $32,189,000, or over two and a half times the amount expended on these same projects the last fiscal year and more than double the average amount expended on them for the past five years. What I have said only applied to those projects for which an estimate for appropriation was submitted to go in this bill. I want now to briefly call the attention of the committee to some facts bearing on the rivers and harbors work for the entire country and to submit a few figures, calling attention to the financial status as of November 1, 1919.

The average amount expended from appropriations carried in river and harbor bills for the past five years exclusive of the amounts carried for the lower Mississippi River improvement, which is now handled by another committee, was $26,329,351. The total amount expended during the fiscal year of 1919 from appropriations carried in river and harbor bills for improvement and maintenance for all projects was $21,145,177. The total unexpended balances on hand November 1 to pay for work to be done on river and harbor improvements up until March 4, 1921, amounted to almost $60,000,000. If we add the $12,000,000 carried in this bill, it will provide a sum including contract obligations of some $70,000,000 to carry on the river and harbor works of the country from November 1, 1919, until March 4, 1921, a sum much greater than ever so expended.

Section 2 of the bill carries an appropriation of $400,000 for examinations, surveys, and contingencies. This appropriation pays the expense of examinations and surveys; also the expense of the Board of Engineers while on official business, inspecting bridges, holding bridge hearings pertaining to river and harbor work. It also provides for the Ports Facilities Commission, an activity that has been transferred from the Shipping Board to the engineers' office.

Section 3 provides for the repeal of this language, which was carried as a Senate amendment in the last river and harbor bill, which reads: "No work shall be undertaken upon any new project herein adopted unless the Secretary of War shall be of the opinion that, based upon the cost at the time of entering upon the work, the project can be completed at a cost not greater than 40 per cent in excess of the estimate of cost in the report upon such project be, and the same is hereby, repealed."

There were some 80 new projects carried in the last bill, and 17 of same can not be completed within the limit of cost laid down in this provision, and the committee thinks it should be repealed.

The other sections are legislative provisions that apply locally and carry no appropriation. The committee is firm in the belief that the balances on hand, together with the amount carried in this bill, will provide sufficient funds to meet every need of commerce until March 4, 1921. [Applause.]

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I will.

Mr. JUUL. I wish the chairman would emphasize the fact that this $7,000,000 sought to be appropriated and the $5,000,000 lump sum are in addition to the many millions now in the United States Treasury appropriated for specific items.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. That is true.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. There are no specific items provided for in the bill. I desire to ask the chairman if the sum of $5,000,000 for the preservation and maintenance of existing work covers the amount estimated by the engineers?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Not the amount estimated, but the engineers say that they can get along with a lump sum of $5,000,000.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. The $7,000,000 appropriated in this bill for the prosecution of the work of improvement and repair will, of course, not cover the estimates for these projects by the engineers, but with the sums remaining in the Treasury unexpended the total sum will amount to about thirty-two and one-half million dollars.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. For projects estimated for in this bill?

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Yes; about two and a half times the amount spent last year.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Yes; on the same projects.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I will yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BRIGGS. The appropriations which have already been made for these various projects are assigned to the particular projects?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. That is true.

Mr. BRIGGS. In other words, it may be the Mississippi or the Ohio River, and they pertain only to that fund or that project and are not available for other projects?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. They can only be used for the one project for which they are appropriated.

Mr. BRIGGS. That is as I understand it. They are only available for the specific project for which they were appropriated, and the only amount available for other specific projects is out of the amount contained and carried in this bill.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. That is true; but I will say that if the gentleman will examine the balances on hand, the projects for which estimates were made, he will find in practically every case that they have a great deal larger sum on hand than was spent during the last fiscal year.

Mr. BRIGGS. That, I assume, was on account of the failure to do much work during the war period.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Yes; that is true, and in some cases delay occurred as to the spending of the money on account of high water of the rivers. We held up 17 projects adopted in the last river and harbor bill.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. All the projects heretofore undertaken and provided for in the past are to be cared for in the prosecution of this work through the lump sum provided in this bill—not new undertakings, not new projects, but projects that have been in course of construction for many years in the past. Will all of these projects receive their proportionate quota of the amount carried in this bill?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. The gentleman will understand that the engineers only asked for appropriation for 50 projects. The balance of the projects have sufficient funds on hand to tide them over next year. The balances on hand, even with the part of the $7,000,000, will provide adequately for all projects for which estimates were made to go in this bill.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I will.

Mr. DUNBAR. Under the provisions of this bill the Secretary of War is authorized to expend $12,000,000, the balance remaining in the Treasury, the coming year.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. He is authorized to expend $7,000,000 appropriated in this bill.

Mr. DUNBAR. What about the unexpended balance of $12,000,000?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. What does the gentleman mean by the unexpended balance of $12,000,000?

Mr. DUNBAR. I understand there is an unexpended balance of $12,000,000.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. There is an unexpended balance of over $25,000,000.

Mr. DUNBAR. Is he to expend that amount?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. He is already authorized to do that.

Mr. DUNBAR. Can the gentleman give me any information as to the probability of the Secretary of War pushing this work and spending the money for the projects for which the money has been appropriated?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I think they aim to prosecute the work as rapidly as they can. Take the case of the Ohio River, during the past fiscal year they have been held up on account of high water. They had difficulty down there about securing contractors. The result has been to delay that work a year.

Mr. DUNBAR. In the case of the Ohio River there is a project, and I understand appropriations have been made, to make it a 9-foot stream. Dams have been built down as far as Cincinnati, and beginning at the mouth of the river dams have been built up to Evansville, leaving a stretch of 300 or 400 miles that is now not navigable, due to the fact that appropriations that have been made have not been spent to build dams and to give a 9-foot depth through this stretch of the Ohio River, which renders all the money spent on the two ends of the river practically valueless because the money we spent has not been able to produce navigation.

Now, does the gentleman believe that under the operation of his bill the Secretary of War will push this work so as to build these remaining dams in the Ohio River and make it navigable from Pittsburgh to Cairo?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. It is the intention to complete the Ohio River project as soon as practicable.

When the estimates were made for the dams for the lower reach of the river, away back in 1910, I think it was shown it would cost something like $800,000 to build those dams. It would probably cost $5,000,000 now, and would take three years to complete each of them. I would say, further, to the gentleman in regard to the improvement, that the engineers are completing the dams above Cincinnati so as to give the 9-foot depth from Cincinnati to Pittsburgh. A few years ago they started in on the policy of building alternate dams, so as to get a pool depth of something like 6 feet, and then follow up by building the alternate dams to provide the project depth of 9 feet. The only dams, I think, they have constructed down below Cincinnati have been below the mouths of rivers, figuring that it would afford some navigation a part of the way up the river.

Mr. DUNBAR. Under the provisions of this bill, I am justified in believing that the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to complete the dams in the Ohio River as soon as the work can be done, consistent with economy and conditions.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. And we are giving all the money that they can use for the prosecution of that work.

Mr. DUNBAR. For the next two years.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, did not Col. Taylor assure us in the committee that this bill carried sufficient money to continue the Ohio project this year, and in answer to questions he said he thought it would take six years to complete the project?

Mr. LONGWORTH. How much is left of the appropriations possible for the Ohio River at the present time?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. The amount they have set aside to do the work by day labor is about $5,000,000. I understand from the report that there is perhaps three or four million dollars of unexpended balance to be applied on construction of dams.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. The bill provides for an appropriation of $7,000,000 for the improvement work.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. And $5,000,000 for maintenance. The $7,000,000 will be distributed to all the rivers and harbors of the country, as it may be advisable, by the Board of Engineers under the Secretary of War.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. That is correct.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. The gentleman is aware, is he not, that for that reach of the river from the mouth of the Ohio at Cairo to the mouth of the Missouri River above St. Louis, there is now available only $319,891?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I think that is the amount.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. So that that is a mere bagatelle. There is available, or was on the 1st of December, 1919, for the Missouri River from the mouth, at Kansas City, $323,029. That is correct as given by the Board of Engineers.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I take it that that is the correct amount.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. I would say to the gentleman that Col. Taylor, of the Board of Engineers, gave me those figures. The Mississippi River, from the mouth of the Missouri to St. Paul, has a fund for improvement and maintenance of $498,694. So that those sums for those reaches of the river are mere bagatelles, and unless a very substantial distribution of this fund of $7,000,000 would be made to these particular rivers that improvement work would be halted in its entirety, would it not?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I would say to the gentleman that they have money enough on hand to maintain the projects to accommodate all of the commerce that is on those streams.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. It is a fact that where a certain sum of money has been appropriated for a particular project that is a sacred fund and may not be taken for any other project.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. That is true.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. If these are the only amounts that remain available for the prosecution of the work, how can the committee in its report say that there is a sufficient sum for the prosecution of work and for the protection of the work which has been completed?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. There is no commerce at the present time needing the improved channel on the Missouri River. I think that would be conceded.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. I differ with the gentleman about that.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. There is no commerce on the upper Mississippi River that will need any additional channel depth. If they maintain the present channel depth, it will adequately accommodate all of the commerce on the Mississippi River.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. It would be impossible for a man to swim unless he had water, and it is impossible to float boats unless you have the channels. If the work is completed, then you will have these channels, under repeated surveys and resurveys by the Board of Engineers, on which to move the vast commerce from the upper Mississippi, the Missouri, and the lower Mississippi, as well as the Ohio. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] that $4,170,000 remains available for the improvement of the Ohio, but that the cost of the lower dams to make all of the work on the upper part of the river above Cincinnati of use will run about eight or nine million dollars per dam and that $4,000,000 is a bagatelle.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. SHREVE. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee if the lump sum is considered sufficient to provide for difficulties in cases of emergency that might happen in the future. For instance, take the harbor at Erie. Contracts have already been let for a large sum for the restoration of the peninsula there, but unfortunately the work has not been completed. The situation now confronts us that we are likely to lose another piece of the peninsula before next summer. Will there be sufficient money to provide for that emergency in case it should arise?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I would say to the gentleman that the engineers have on hand now the sum of about $400,000, which they saved from the 1915 lump-sum bill, which could be applied to such work as the gentleman refers to.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. In the appropriations for specific works heretofore made and unused is there any provision in the law for the lapsing of those appropriations?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. There is not.

Mr. MILLER. Then they remain good?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. They remain good until expended, unless by act of Congress they are turned back to the Treasury.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Certain estimates have been made by Col. Taylor and the Board of Engineers for certain projects. Will there be sufficient funds with the $7,000,000, together with the $25,000,000 already on hand, to take care of those projects?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I can answer the gentleman by stating that the amount on hand for the period between November 1, 1919, and March 4, 1921, will be two and a half times as much as the amount spent during the last fiscal year.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Now, will the amount to be spent on these projects be based on the estimates to be made by the engineers handling these matters? Col. Taylor's estimate, contained in his report——

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. The money already in project funds can be used only for the particular projects for which it was appropriated.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I appreciate that.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. And those are the funds to which I refer when I say they amount to over $25,000,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Now, take, for instance, Gulfport; Col. Taylor's report shows that $130,000 will be needed for that place. Would there be sufficient funds in these estimates to take care of those places?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Part of that will be taken care of from the maintenance fund.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. That is what I want to know.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Oh, yes. The maintenance fund here is supposed to take care of the maintenance work.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. And there will be sufficient for maintenance work?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I yield.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. I would like to know what is the extent of the water traffic. Will it extend the traffic along those rivers, like the Ohio, which are paralleled by the railroads that are hauling all the freight?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. At the present time there has been very little commerce developed on the rivers. We hope when the railroad legislation gets through that this commerce will develop.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. There have been enormous appropriations for that purpose, and yet there is no traffic on the river.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield to me so that I may answer that question?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I yield.

Mr. DUNBAR. I will state regarding the transportation of coal on the Ohio River, that I was formerly in the utility business, and by reason of it the purchase of coal was one of the operations of our business which concerned me most. Up until about five years ago we bought all of our coal and transported it by river from Pittsburgh to New Albany, right across the river from Louisville. Up until about that time there was annually conveyed down the Ohio River, passing Louisville, 6,000,000 tons of coal every year. The cost of the river transportation on that coal was about 40 cents per ton. Railroad transportation on the same coal amounted to $1.40 per ton, or a saving of $6,000,000 a year on transportation of coal alone on the Ohio River from Pittsburgh to Louisville. But due to the fact of the uncertainty of the stage of the river, the transportation of coal by that route has gradually been discontinued, until to-day I doubt if there are 50,000 tons of coal that come down the Ohio River. And the reason of that is that there is no certainty of transportation on account of the stage of the river being so low for most of the year; and by reason of the lack of certainty of being able to obtain this coal by river, transportation has diverted the carrying of that coal to the railroads.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Just another question. Did not the railroads meet that water rate?

Mr. DUNBAR. There was absolutely no transportation by railroad, and they did not meet that water rate, and the reason they did not meet it, or the reason the river transportation was discontinued, was the fact that there are not over 50 days in the year when the river is navigable for barges so that coal could be transported. Boating became unprofitable and people quit laying up their surplus supplies, and the coal is now being obtained from other parts of the country instead of Pittsburgh.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. That is a very unique case, but ordinarily they meet the rates, and in that way drive water traffic away. I would like to see water traffic developed, but the railroads make rates that drive it out of the business.

Mr. DUNBAR. Of course, what is necessary is to complete the Ohio River to a 9-foot stage.

Mr. OGDEN. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I will.

Mr. OGDEN. Do I understand the unexpended balances will be sufficient to carry forward the projects on the Ohio River between Cincinnati and Evansville until March, 1921?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I think the amount will be sufficient; yes, sir.

Mr. OGDEN. Did the Chief of Engineers express an opinion as to that?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. He asked for $1,000,000 for lock and dam work on the Ohio River. He also made a statement that during the last fiscal year they were not able to carry on the work more than a fourth of the time. And it is my judgment that they will have more money than they will use between now and the 4th of March, 1921.

Mr. OGDEN. For those projects, what is the amount of the unexpended balances?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. It is pretty hard to tell just what the amount is. When they make a contract for a dam, say, for $1,000,000, they set aside $1,000,000, and then that is considered a contract obligation. It is tied up as a contract obligation, but the money has not been expended in a great many cases where that was done, as far back as two or three years.

Mr. OGDEN. But there was no additional appropriation asked for by the Chief of Engineers for any of the projects in the Ohio River between Cincinnati and Evansville, as I understand?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Well, we have been appropriating for the Ohio River as a whole, and the engineers used the money where they desired to use it, at any place between Cairo and Pittsburgh.

Mr. FOSTER. Three-fourths of last year's appropriation is still available for this year, and this year is an eight-month year.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I will.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Does the gentleman think there will be any perceptible difference in the price of coal to the consumers, whether it be carried by railroads or by boats?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Well, I do not know about that.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I yield.

Mr. McDUFFIE. As I understand it, it is not contemplated that any new projects will be undertaken under this bill?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. That is true. There are no new projects authorized in this bill.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I notice from the report of the Chief of Engineers an appropriation of $300,000 was suggested for maintenance for the harbor of Mobile, and I want to know if the chairman of the committee thinks that under this legislation that recommendation can be carried out?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I would say to the gentleman——

Mr. McDUFFIE. That is, this money is to be expended for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920. That is, this year?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. The amounts carried in this bill are to take care of the next fiscal year, or part of the next fiscal year, until March 4, 1921, when the next annual bill will have become a law. But I will say to the gentleman that this $5,000,000 lump-sum appropriation is to take care of the maintenance at the various points in the country where maintenance estimates were made to go into this bill.

Mr. McDUFFIE. And the Chief of Engineers advised the committee that that sum would do that?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Yes; that sum would be sufficient.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Has it not been the expressed policy of the gentleman's party to oppose these lump-sum appropriations, and to gradually do away with them?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I think that is true as to general lump-sum appropriations, but the gentleman must remember——

Mr. BLANTON. Then why change the usual mode of framing a river and harbor bill, where the items are specified, to one lump-sum appropriation bill?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Of course, the gentleman will understand that the objections that are made against the ordinary lump-sum appropriations will not meet this case, because here the money can only be expended for one specific purpose. Take the case of maintenance: Heretofore, when we appropriated separately for maintenance, we did not know exactly how much they needed for that item, and we had to give them just what they asked for, because there was no way of telling just how much they would need.

Mr. BLANTON. As to appropriations for maintenance, in making lump-sum appropriations such as are made in this bill, can it not all be spent for maintenance for one project, as against the rights of all the others?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. It can be spent where the engineers deem it necessary.

Mr. BLANTON. If it is a wise policy to oppose lump-sum appropriations as a policy, why should not the policy be pursued in framing this bill?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I thought I had explained that to the gentleman a moment ago. The objection to the ordinary lump-sum appropriation does not obtain here.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. RHODES. I observe that the Secretary of War is not authorized and directed to cause any preliminary examination and survey to be made of Mississippi River improvements except at one place, namely, at Fort Madison Harbor. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee why it is that no such request is made of the Secretary of War for preliminary examinations and surveys on the Mississippi River between the mouth of the Missouri and the mouth of the Ohio?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. There have been no requests for any surveys of that portion of the river.

Mr. RHODES. I should like to ask the chairman if he is not aware of the fact that there are three bills at present pending before the committee asking for just that sort of improvements?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. What sort of improvements does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. RHODES. Asking for surveys and preliminary reports by the Board of Engineers looking toward permanent improvements on the Mississippi River at St. Genevieve, Mo., the oldest town in the State; at Herculaneum, Mo.; and at Perryville, Mo.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. What reach of the river is that on? Is it between St. Louis and Cairo?

Mr. RHODES. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. Is it not true that in those projects they are asking for appropriations and not surveys?

Mr. RHODES. The gentleman has failed to understand my statement. I have just stated that in three certain bills now pending there is a request for these surveys and preliminary reports and estimates, because I happen to be the author of the bills.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. It has been the policy of the committee to order no surveys on a reach of river where the entire reach was being improved for navigation and where the engineers could use the money we appropriated to do the work that is proposed to be done if the survey should be made and the project adopted. It is only in cases where the engineers can not use the money they have on hand to do the work that we order a special survey. We do it in a case of that kind.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I yield.

Mr. DENISON. Heretofore the custom has been to make specific appropriations to be expended on certain parts of the Mississippi River, has it not, in this annual appropriation bill?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. The Mississippi River is divided into three sections.

Mr. DENISON. And the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has heretofore made appropriations of certain amounts to be expended on the Mississippi River from the Head of Passes to the mouth of the Ohio, and a certain other amount on the Mississippi River from the mouth of the Missouri to the mouth of the Ohio and from the mouth of the Missouri to St. Paul and Minneapolis, a certain amount on the Ohio, and a certain amount on the Missouri. Has not that been the policy of the committee?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. The committee has not made appropriations for the lower Mississippi from Cairo south. That is in the hands of the Flood Control Committee.

Mr. DENISON. That is true; but on other parts of the river they have made appropriations?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. That is true.

Mr. DENISON. Then, why is there not the same reason this year for doing that that there has always been?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. We figure that they have money enough on hand to accommodate the commerce.

Mr. DENISON. Of course, as to having enough money on hand to accommodate commerce, we can never have any commerce unless we deepen the river and prepare it for commerce. You can not swim unless you have sufficient water to swim in.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. We have had a channel maintained from St. Louis to Cairo at a depth of 8 feet for 10 years.

Mr. DENISON. If the gentleman's theory is correct, we have no need of making many appropriations, because we have very little commerce. I thought the idea was to deepen the channel so as to accommodate commerce in the future.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Yes; for a question.

Mr. RHODES. The gentleman has stated that the policy has been to make an 8-foot channel south of St. Louis, between that point and Cairo. I ask the gentleman if he knows whether or not it is a fact that the 8-foot channel, if it does exist, lies so far from the shore that it serves no useful purpose in aiding commerce?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. The report of the engineers for this year shows that they have an 8-foot channel throughout that entire reach, a channel sufficiently wide and deep to accommodate the commerce.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield just for a moment? I do not want to detain the gentleman.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. About what is the amount appropriated each year for the maintenance of rivers and harbors?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. The amount expended last year was a little over $7,000,000. That was during the fiscal year. This bill provides for only eight months.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Was or was not the work of maintenance interfered with to some extent by the war activities last year?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I do not think the maintenance work was interfered with much, because the Government does that with its own plant.

Mr. McDUFFIE. You are carrying $5,000,000 for maintenance. Then, as I understand it, you figure that there are at least $2,000,000 unexpended?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Yes; to the credit of these projects. There was $12,000,000 the 1st of November to the credit of the various projects.

Mr. McDUFFIE. For maintenance?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. For maintenance.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to ask the gentleman whether this $7,000,000 is sufficient to provide the funds as recommended by the department for the prosecution of the work during the next eight months?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. That was not the amount asked for; no.

Mr. LINTHICUM. What was the amount asked for?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. The revised estimate amounted to about $25,000,000, but the gentleman will understand that the engineers base their estimates for appropriations on the ground that when a project is adopted they should recommend such sums from time to time as will complete it economically and without any delay. So their purpose is to complete the project whether it is needed in the interests of commerce or not.

Mr. LINTHICUM. A certain sum was recommended for Baltimore Harbor for the continuation of the work which has been authorized and partly finished. I want to know whether the sum of $7,000,000 will take care of cases of that kind.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I think it will.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman from Iowa has just stated the purpose of the Chief of Engineers in making these recommendations to be to complete the projects at the earliest possible time. Does the chairman of the committee approve of that purpose?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. In view of the fact that we are facing a $3,000,000,000 deficit at the end of the next fiscal year, the chairman of the committee feels that we should not appropriate money at this time except where it is absolutely necessary.

Mr. DENISON. As I understand it, this bill is simply the result of an effort on the part of the committee to cut down appropriations without regard to the merits of the various propositions at all?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Oh, not at all.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. In the event that the amount now on hand to the credit of any given project which has been in the course of construction for several years should be expended before March 4, 1921, I understand the chairman to say that the engineers will be authorized in that event to appropriate out of the $12,000,000——

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Out of the $7,000,000.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. For maintenance——

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Yes; $12,000,000 for maintenance and improvement together——

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Either for maintenance or improvement?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Making it $12,000,000 in all?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. A sufficient sum with which to prosecute the work until the next annual appropriation is made by the Congress?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BRIGGS. I understood the gentleman to say that the revised estimates of the Chief of Engineers amounted to about $25,000,000.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Including $5,000,000 for maintenance.

Mr. BRIGGS. To what extent was that estimate of $25,000,000 reduced by the committee?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. We cut it down to $12,000,000.

Mr. BRIGGS. The original estimate was $42,000,000?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Between $42,000,000 and $43,000,000.

Mr. BRIGGS. So it is reduced from $42,000,000 down to $12,000,000?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. That is true.

Mr. BRIGGS. Is that intended to be a horizontal reduction? I mean by that is it taken from each project throughout the country in about the same amount, or is it taken off some communities at the expense of other communities? Are the recommendations for some communities carried out to completion and others not? How is that done?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. The bill provides that the money shall be expended where it is most needed in the interest of commerce.

Mr. BRIGGS. Is the amount that is allowed by the committee in this bill such that the Chief of Engineers states that he can carry on all the projects now being conducted by the Government until the next river and harbor bill is passed?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I do not think he has ever made that statement.

Mr. FOSTER. He did say, did he not, that it was ample to carry on the commerce of the country?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Oh, yes; he made the statement that with the $5,000,000 for maintenance he could maintain the channels of the harbors of the country so as to accommodate all the commerce.

Mr. BRIGGS. He said it would carry on all the work that is necessary with reference to the channels?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. He said that he could, without any improvement work of any kind for the next fiscal year.

Mr. BRIGGS. Without any improvement work?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. This $7,000,000 fund is to be applied, however, not to new improvements or new work in connection with established projects?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. That is true. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the remainder of my time. How much time have I used?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used 55 minutes. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. SMALL] for two hours.

Mr. SMALL. Will the Chair kindly inform me when I have occupied 40 minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, the policy of the Rivers and Harbors Committee and the policy of the House, founded upon a practice of many, many years, is to formulate and report a river and harbor bill in the following manner. They recommend specific appropriations for maintenance of each project and specific appropriations for the further improvement of projects which have theretofore been adopted but not completed.

Then if they deemed it wise to include in the bill new projects they recommended new projects, with an initial appropriation. Each bill carried an additional appropriation to cover the cost of surveys and examinations authorized. In the last river and harbor bill we thought it wise to increase that amount so as to cover, in so far as possible, contingencies or emergencies which could not be foreseen and which might arise through floods or storms or other damage by the elements.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield? I wish to make a point of order.

Mr. SMALL. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I find in this bill a most decided change from former conditions as to the making of these river and harbor appropriations. The gentleman now addressing the House has the experience and knowledge which I believe the membership of the House should have, and I make the point that there is no quorum present, in order that Members may have the information that the gentleman has to give.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma makes the point that no quorum is present. Evidently there is no quorum present, but the Chair will count.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. The Chairman having announced that there is no quorum present, I submit that under the rule there is nothing else but to proceed with the calling of the roll.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from Texas is not quite correct. If the Chair had definitely announced that a quorum was not present the gentleman might be right, but the Chair stated that evidently a quorum was not present but the Chair would count.

Mr. BLANTON. When the Chair said that evidently a quorum was not present I assumed that that was an announcement that we were without a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that was not a definite determination. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Seventy-five Members present, not a quorum, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HUSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having under consideration the bill H. R. 11892, the river and harbor appropriation bill, finding itself without a quorum, he had caused the roll to be called, whereupon 293 Members answered to their names, and he presented a list of the absentees.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 866. An act providing for the issuance to Herman L. Karpeles of a duplicate of an original medal of honor awarded to his father, Leopold Karpeles, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of War to issue to Herman L. Karpeles a duplicate of the original medal of honor awarded to his father, Leopold Karpeles, late sergeant, Company E, Fifty-seventh Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, for gallantry at the Wilderness, Va., on May 6, 1864, the original medal having been destroyed by fire on March 10, 1913, the cost of which shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated;

S. 849. An act to reimburse S. S. Buzzerd, postmaster at Berkeley Springs, W. Va.;

S. 3245. An act to regulate the marriage of persons in the military and naval forces of the United States in foreign countries and for other purposes;

S. 1454. An act for the relief of John F. Kelly;

S. 2782. An act for the purchase of the embassy building and grounds of the United States, at Santiago, Chile; and

S. 3176. An act to authorize the President of the United States to appoint Marion C. Raysor an officer of the Army.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10137) to amend an act entitled "An act to classify the officers and members of the fire department of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1908, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 9112. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to loan Army rifles to posts of the American Legion.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 1216. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide aid to State or Territorial homes for the support of disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States," approved August 27, 1888, as amended March 2, 1889;

H. R. 2980. An act to increase the efficiency of the Military Establishment of the United States; and

H. R. 10331. An act to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919," approved July 9, 1918.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I have just stated that it had been the uniform policy of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House to report and the House pass a river and harbor bill formulated substantially as follows: Appropriating an amount for maintenance of specific improvements; appropriations made for further improvement of projects already adopted but not completed. If the committee thought wise, it reported in addition new projects for adoption and made initial appropriations on account of those projects. Also a lump-sum appropriation was made to cover the cost of surveys and to meet contingencies, and in the last river and harbor bill, and perhaps in others, that appropriation had been increased to cover emergencies caused by flood and storms which could not be anticipated.

I do not recall that there has been a single exception to a bill of that character reported by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors or passed by this House. There have been two bills which became laws carrying lump-sum appropriations. Those bills in such form were passed by the Senate and were only agreed to by your conferees on the part of the House when they were told that they must accept a bill in that form or no bill. Lump-sum appropriations for river and harbor bills have heretofore been prepared and advocated by the enemies of water-borne commerce and of river and harbor appropriations and not by friends.

This bill carries an appropriation of $12,000,000—$5,000,000 for maintenance and $7,000,000 for improvements. The bill is not only a departure from the past policy of your committee and the House, but I believe it is vicious, and whatever may have been the intent of those who propose it or those who advocate it, in effect and results it will be unfriendly to river and harbor appropriations and to the maintenance of the rivers and harbors of the country.

I shall endeavor to give as succinctly as I can some reasons for that statement and for the faith that is in me, but before doing so I beg the indulgence of the committee to say something about the general subject of transportation, which river and harbor bills are intended to promote. We have for several years passed through an acute stage in transportation and in the distribution of the products of the country. We have not enough facilities for distribution. Admittedly the facilities offered by the railroads are insufficient. Where shall we turn? There are only two other instrumentalities, the waterways and the highways.

Fortunately there is a strong public sentiment existing in almost every State for the improvement of our highways. That wise piece of legislation, the Federal road act, providing for cooperation with the States through their State highway commissions, has worked well. The chief benefit has been in arousing public sentiment in favor of a wise construction of highways, and I think we may well look forward to the time when upon these hard-surfaced roads, trucks of large capacity will carry an aggregate in tonnage of the commerce of the country, which will tend to relieve the present strain upon the existing facilities of distribution. The only other instrumentality to which we can turn is the waterways. Are there those who would say that waterways are not useful, are not capable of being utilized in the carriage of our commerce? If so, let them speak. I think it is a fair statement that the whole world, that every intelligent man, realizes that these waterways can be and ought to be utilized for the purposes of the distribution of our commerce.

There has never been a time in all our history since we entered upon the era of railroad building, about 1837, when the country needed the utilization of its waterways for commerce more than it does to-day. There have been those who said that the railroads have been sufficient for the needs of our commerce, and there may be some to-day, but let me remind them that wherever there is a navigable waterway, potential or used, the railroads immediately become frightened of it and seek to reduce their rates or to indulge in other ruinous methods of competition in order to destroy the waterway. We had barely completed the great Isthmian Canal and ships had begun to ply through it, carrying commerce between the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts, before the transcontinental railroads applied to the Interstate Commerce Commission for a reduction in transcontinental rates to meet the competition of the canal.

With respect to the Mississippi River and the Ohio River, and every other navigable waterway in the United States, used or unused, the railroads are afraid of them, and that fact which is known of all men gives contradiction to the suggestion that the railroads are sufficient for the transportation needs of the country.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. I yield.

Mr. KINKAID. Is it not a fact that wherever waterways have been provided, to afford competition with railway transportation, the rates upon the railroads have been so arranged as to permit the railways to successfully compete with the waterway transportation, thus rendering the waterway transportation of no use whatever?

Mr. SMALL. Yes; the general proposition that the gentleman states is correct.

Mr. KINKAID. How is that to be remedied?

Mr. SMALL. I will come to that in a moment. I would remind the gentleman that wherever rail rates competitive with water rates are reduced, other rail rates into the interior either remain stationary or are increased in order to compensate for the loss in the lowered rates competitive with water rates. The gentleman asks, and I am going to enlarge his question, Why have we not used our waterways more? Why have they been neglected in some sections of the country? They have been neglected to some extent through the indifference of the people of the country, who have permitted themselves to entertain the statement that the waterways were unnecessary in the distribution of our commerce.

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. In a moment. In other respects the waterways have been impaired, water transportation lines have been throttled in the past, and have been withdrawn because of unfair and destructive methods on the part of the railroads with which they competed. I yield.

Mr. DUNBAR. Does not the gentleman believe that the reason that waterway transportation has become obsolete to a great extent has been the fact that there has been no dependable stage of water in the inland rivers which would permit them to be navigated throughout the year?

Mr. SMALL. Of course, that is true to a large extent, and there is no better illustration of it than the Ohio River.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman permit me to state the conditions on the Ohio River?

Mr. SMALL. If the gentleman will be brief.

Mr. DUNBAR. For 310 days in the year, from Pittsburgh to Cairo, we do not have a navigable stream which will permit the transportation of coal in barges.

Mr. SMALL. I wish now to claim the attention of the House for a brief statement as to some of these artificial and arbitrary reasons which have militated against the development of water transportation. One is this unfair system of competition by the railroads, and I submit this proposition: That no railroad should have the right to reduce its rates competitive with a waterway unless it reduces its rates over its entire lines in the interior as well. [Applause.] I believe that proposition is not only just, but that no man can defend the practices which have existed with regard to this competition between the waterways and the railroads.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes; for a question.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Take the converse of that proposition. I have a river that runs through my district which is navigable the year round. A subsidiary corporation of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad owns the packet lines there, and if anyone else undertakes to enter into competition with them they adopt the policy of lowering their rates, and I have seen those boats run and carry the freight absolutely for nothing. What is the gentleman's remedy for that?

Mr. SMALL. The boat line owned by the railroad?

Mr. KINCHELOE. A subsidiary corporation; yes. The Louisville & Nashville Railroad really owns it under another corporation.

Mr. SMALL. Well, I can not go into the remedy for that——

Mr. KINCHELOE. It is information I wanted.

Mr. SMALL (continuing). Because at this time there is no agency of the Federal Government which has the power to fix and regulate the rates upon water lines proper—that is to say, where they do not exchange traffic with the railroads. But those States have the absolute power in intrastate commerce to control that matter.

I believe that the time has come to compel by legislation a readjustment of all these rail rates competitive with waterways, so that there shall be a substantial parity of rates upon the railroads which parallel waterways and railroads which extend into the interior. The improvement of waterways, the expenditure of Federal money upon their improvement, can only be predicated upon the use of those waterways. There ought not to exist any such factor in traffic rates as potential water competition. If any section contiguous to a navigable waterway wishes to get the benefit of the waterway, they are not in right and justice entitled to get that benefit through a reduction of rail rates competitive with that waterway, but their only privilege and benefit is through the use of that waterway and thereby cheapening rates by water. I do not believe this proposition can be too completely and continuously emphasized, because in it lies the kernel of a readjustment, of a return to justice, of rates by water and by rail, and a removal of a flagrant injustice toward some of the interior sections of the country. [Applause.]

Tell me, if you please, what justice there can be in this? As I said, transcontinental rates were reduced on account of the Isthmian Canal. Who got the benefit of it? Points on the Pacific and Atlantic coasts. Take the intermountain section, the Rocky Mountain States, and are they deriving any benefit from those reduced rates? On the contrary, they are paying the old rates, and, in some instances, even higher rates. It costs them more to-day in many instances to have freight sent, say, from Baltimore or Philadelphia or New York or Boston, to Seattle or San Francisco or Los Angeles, and have it carried that short distance into points in those intermountain States, than it did previously by the transcontinental rail lines at the old prevailing rates. They are penalized because of the existence of the Isthmian Canal, and points along the two oceans—the Atlantic and Pacific—are benefited. It is an unfair and unjust discrimination, and it ought to cease in the interest of a cessation of discrimination against any section of the country. Waterways are to be used, and they are to be improved at Federal expense only if they are used.

Mr. WELTY. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. SMALL. Just for a question.

Mr. WELTY. How much were those rates reduced between the Atlantic and Pacific after the opening up of the Panama Canal?

Mr. SMALL. I am sorry I can not give those details from memory. They are in my office, but I would not undertake to repeat them.

There are some other essentials to water transportation, and among them is the interchange of traffic. What has been the chief factor in building up our rail transportation system, the greatest in the world? It has been the standardizing of tracks and equipment, and the interchange of traffic between the different lines of railroads. You can go to the agent of a railroad in the most remote and provincial section of the United States and give the agent time to telegraph, and he will give you a through rate and a through bill of lading to the most remote section in any other part of the United States, and the freight may go over 15 or 20 or 25 different railroad lines. There ought to be the same interchange of traffic between established water lines and rail lines to-day as exists between the different rail lines. We passed a law in the Panama Canal act in 1912 which we thought would remedy this deficiency by empowering the Interstate Commerce Commission, under proper conditions, to establish such interchange of traffic between water and rail. Although many applications have been made, few orders have followed establishing such interchange of traffic. And until we shall provide for just, free, and flexible arrangements for interchange of traffic between established water lines and rail lines the water lines will not have come into their own or have received that degree of traffic which they deserve and ought to enjoy in the interest of the public.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Are they not making some such provision as the gentleman advocates in the railroad bill that is now in conference?

Mr. SMALL. Yes. In fact, the House passed an amendment making it compulsory on the Interstate Commerce Commission to compel them to do so, and I hope some such provision will remain in the bill.

Another factor which has prevented waterways from carrying the volume of traffic which they ought to have done has been the lack of terminal facilities—terminal facilities located upon the water front, with capacious warehouses, with tracks connecting the terminal with the railroads serving the community, with modern methods of transfer of freight between the boat and the warehouse or the rail car, respectively, in the cheapest and most expeditious way. Without such a terminal local traffic can only be carried at much expense, particularly upon our interior rivers in the Mississippi Valley. By local traffic, I mean traffic which originates and ends upon a water line. But it is impossible to have interchange of traffic with the railroads without the existence of such adequate water terminals. And I think one of the constructive pieces of work which your Committee on Rivers and Harbors has accomplished during the past two years, upon which there has been unanimity among all the members of the committee, has been their intention and purpose to gradually make appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors dependent upon local cooperation to the extent of providing such adequate terminals as shall meet with the approval of the engineers.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman be kind enough to tell the House to what extent the committee has succeeded in getting the cooperation of the local communities?

Mr. SMALL. In the last river and harbor act that policy of the committee was crystallized in a paragraph of law to the effect that it was the declared policy of Congress to require communities to provide such terminals, and clothing the War Department with the discretion to withhold the expenditure of appropriations for their improvement until satisfactory assurances were given that terminals would be provided.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, then, another question, if I may, as to what extent has the War Department cooperated with the Congress in the execution of the legislation enacted?

Mr. SMALL. I am glad to respond that the War Department, through the Chief and Corps of Engineers, have recently become active in their efforts to induce cities and towns to construct water terminals. Every district engineer throughout the country is endeavoring to administer this policy of Congress so as to provide for water terminals. And I believe in a few years there will not be a city upon any navigable waterway which will not have a terminal which answers the needs of water transportation and interchange of traffic with the railroads.

There comes into my mind at the moment—and it is one of many—the city of Memphis, upon the Mississippi River. That city has not heretofore provided a modern water terminal, but antiquated methods have been used ever since Memphis and the Mississippi River have been situated side by side. It is believed that Memphis will soon take steps to construct such a terminal.

Unless a change has been recently made, the barge line which is carrying commerce between St. Louis and New Orleans has been unable to touch at Memphis because of a lack of water terminals there. I do not wish to put Memphis in the limelight unfavorably, yet that city just came into my mind. There are other cities just like Memphis. It is a wise policy on the part of the committee and on the part of the Congress to make that declaration.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point regarding cooperation?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Is there any policy on the part of the committee to ask further cooperation than simply as to terminals? That is, as to a division of the actual expense of the local improvements?

Mr. SMALL. The committee has considered that problem very carefully and the members have discussed it with the officials of the War Department, and it is apparently impossible to establish any arbitrary and inflexible rule on the subject.

Mr. TILSON. In the case of the public roads, as the gentleman knows, one of the saving features of that law is that it is required that the States and counties shall contribute, and therefore they become immensely interested in the question as to whether the money expended shall be carefully expended, and that is one of the safeguards of an appropriation. Now, why should it not be the same way, as far as it can be worked, in regard to water transportation?

Mr. SMALL. The more the gentleman studies the question the more difficult he will find it. The conclusion that we have reached up to this time is that in every case of local cooperation and expenditure of money for improvements we must depend upon the particular factors of the case. I want to say this, though—and it is a great pleasure to say it—that the finest civic spirit of enterprise and disposition for self-help in all the United States exists along the Pacific coast. There is no other section of the country that is a near rival to the spirit that exists there in the way of voluntary cooperation with the Government.

There is another necessity for the development of water transportation. There is at present no agency of the Federal Government clothed with authority, as the next friend, if you please, of water lines, for the development of water transportation; and it has been apparent to many for some time that there should be some Federal agency authorized to collect data regarding water transportation, to advise cities and communities as to the best type of terminals, to make plans and estimates of the costs, and the location of such terminals, to give advice as to the best type of boats, and to represent them, in so far as might be necessary, in applications to the Interstate Commerce Commission to obtain an order for the establishment of interchange of traffic, and in every way to aid these segregated lines of water transportation throughout the country in applying to their activities the essential things necessary for the success of that particular line of transportation.

Some of these features, let us hope, will be covered in the pending railroad bill. Some of them were covered by amendments adopted by the House. This provision for a Federal agency was passed by the House and included in the House bill, authorizing the Secretary of War, under the Chief of Engineers, to take that responsibility. I thought, by the way, that a mistake was made in designating the agency. I thought that it ought to have been lodged with the Department of Commerce rather than with the War Department. We hope that there will be in this bill, as finally passed, some mandatory provision requiring an interchange of traffic between water lines and the rail lines. We hope that by this declared policy of Congress, in a few years, more and more water terminals will be provided of an adequate type. The outlook for the immediate future under this enlarged intelligence as to the necessity of additional instrumentalities of transportation by water is improved by these proposed laws which will unshackle water transportation to some extent. I believe the immediate outlook for water transportation to-day is brighter than it has been for 50 years past.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there for a question?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.

Mr. HULINGS. Does the gentleman think that the transcontinental railroad lines had anything to do with the repeal of the act allowing our coastwise traffic to go through the Panama Canal free of tolls?

Mr. SMALL. I am sure I do not know as to that. [Laughter.]

Mr. HULINGS. Does the gentleman think it was a good plan to build the canal and then to impose tolls on our own traffic going through that canal at the instance of the Canadian and transcontinental railroads?

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman has introduced a big question, which we thrashed out here a year or two ago, and I am sure I do not know to what extent the railroads interfered in that controversy.

It may be interesting to members of the committee to get a bit of information regarding navigable waterways in the United States. In that very interesting publication, I think in three or four volumes, entitled "Water Transportation," prepared under the supervision of Herbert Knox Smith, former Commissioner of Corporations, there is a mine of information regarding water transportation in all its phases. In the first volume of that publication he gives some information about the length of navigable rivers in the United States. He states there are about 295 navigable rivers, with an approximate navigable mileage of 26,400 miles. He divides them as follows: Rivers tributary to the Atlantic, 148, with a navigable length of 5,365 miles; tributary to the Gulf, exclusive of the Mississippi, 53 rivers, with a navigable length of 5,212 miles; the Mississippi and its tributaries, 54 rivers, with a total navigable length of 13,912 miles—half of the aggregate length of the navigable rivers of the entire country—rivers tributary to the Pacific, 38, with a navigable length of 1,006 miles; rivers flowing into Canada, 2, with a navigable length of 315 miles.

Some gentlemen, without taking the trouble to examine it, have been inclined to minimize the volume of traffic carried by water in the United States.

It is very difficult to obtain correct data upon this subject, because there is no authority in law for this compilation. We can get accurate figures on our imports and our exports, but it is difficult to obtain such accuracy as to our domestic water-borne commerce. But from the best information I can obtain for the year 1916 there was carried in the United States domestic freight by water 258,083,000 tons. The gross income from the carrying of such freight was $422,773,000.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Does that include the Lakes?

Mr. SMALL. It does. The gross tonnage of the vessels in domestic water transportation was 12,250,000 tons. I could not obtain any estimate as to the value of this domestic commerce. But suppose you place its average value at $30 per ton, which I think is a minimum, as much of it is of greater value, and on that average the freight so carried had a gross value of $7,742,490,000.

But even if you place it at $10 a ton, it has a valuation of $2,580,000,000. These figures are sufficient at least to impress one with the amount of the water-borne commerce carried in the United States. I have just been shown a letter received from Capt. F. T. Chambers, United States Navy, assigned to the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, which furnishes interesting information regarding the domestic water commerce of the United States. I append this letter as Exhibit A.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has occupied 40 minutes.

Mr. SMALL. Thank you for the information. If you should take that commerce from our rivers and attempt to add it to the railroad tonnage of the country, what would be the result? The question carries its own answer. If we can add to that tonnage carried by water 40 per cent or 50 per cent or 100 per cent, which it is entirely practicable to do, who will gainsay the proposition that the industrial and commercial interests of the country will be greatly benefited?

Mr. Chairman, I beg to detain the House to make some comments regarding the suggestion which I made, and made reluctantly, that this bill, no matter what its intent may have been, will result unfavorably to river and harbor bills, and therefore unfriendly to their improvement, and therefore unfriendly to the increased use of our waterways. What are some of the objections to this bill? In the first place, it is an abject surrender by Congress to one administrator in this Government. Does the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] know how much money will be expended next year for the great harbor of Baltimore? Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY], a member of the committee, and do the other gentlemen from New York know how much will be expended for the improvement of that great project in the East River, or how much will be expended at Tonawanda or Buffalo? Does the gentleman from Philadelphia [Mr. COSTELLO], a member of the committee, have any conception or forecast of how much will be expended for the continued improvement of the Delaware River, the greatest and busiest waterway in the United States? No; and he will not know until he goes down and asks the Chief of Engineers how much he is going to allot; and if he does not allot an amount that the gentleman thinks is sufficient he will proceed to persuade the Chief of Engineers to allot more. [Applause.] Congress is putting into the hands of one man the functions which of right Congress ought to exercise. Now, I am not in the slightest degree disparaging any past Chief of Engineers or the able engineer who has just been nominated and perhaps confirmed to succeed Gen. Black. He may be the ablest and justest man in the United States, but he is not any more infallible than an honest Representative in Congress representing an honorable constituency of American citizens.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. TILSON. Does not the committee, as a rule, follow the recommendations of the engineers? And would a Member of Congress have much chance of getting an appropriation for a certain project unless he had back of him the recommendation of the engineers?

Mr. SMALL. Neither the committee nor the House invariably follows the recommendations of the engineers, although when it comes to an engineering question, as to how much can be profitably and wisely expended upon a certain improvement during the next fiscal year, we abide by the judgment of the engineer, because that is very largely a technical question.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SMALL. Just for a question.

Mr. LINTHICUM. It seems to me the question how much will be expended in any particular place will depend largely on how much you cut down the engineer's figures for those various places and whether $7,000,000 will cover what he asks for, or, if not, what proportion of it it will cover. I should like to know about that.

Mr. SMALL. I am coming to that. Why $12,000,000, if you please? Who is the autocrat who said $12,000,000? I should like to have him stand up and say why he issued that decree for $12,000,000. Nobody will arise, because he can not do it.

And let me show you why. In the original estimate contained in this very voluminous report of the Chief of Engineers there was estimated for maintenance and for further improvement the sum of $42,841,565. Of that, $9,060,350 was estimated as necessary for maintenance and $3,452,000 for works of improvement and maintenance where they could not be segregated; for improvement, $30,029,215; for examination, surveys, and contingencies, $300,000; over $42,000,000 for improvement, maintenance, examinations, and surveys.

When your committee undertook the consideration of this bill the suggestion was made that we must curtail and reduce it because of the necessity of exercising economy; and without a single dissenting voice on the committee it was agreed that we would economize and reduce the bill to the limit. The able chairman of the committee, Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa, so directed the representative of the Chief of Engineers, who was present advising us along this line. Then we took up the bill for hearing, having this engineer officer present with us. First, when we came to the matter of appropriations for maintenance, the engineer officer suggested that money could be saved if we would make a lump-sum appropriation for maintenance, and he thought that with a lump-sum appropriation of $5,000,000 he could get along; and the committee, not unanimously but by a majority, in the exercise of their wisdom decided that for maintenance a lump-sum appropriation of $5,000,000 was to be included in the bill. I can say frankly that I opposed that, because I thought it was an unwise and improper method of appropriating, but that was the conclusion of the committee. Then we considered every item for further improvement in the United States where an appropriation was recommended, and we got the final reduced estimate of the engineer officer, a reduction which he said was cutting to the bone.

What did that amount to in the aggregate? The recommendations resulting in reducing the estimates to between nineteen and twenty million dollars; add the $5,000,000 for maintenance and you have an aggregate of between twenty-four and twenty-five million dollars. It was my thought and hope until yesterday morning, when I was informed to the contrary, that the committee would bring in a bill of between twenty-four and twenty-five million dollars, in which every improvement in the United States requiring an appropriation would have had its appropriation for further improvement, based upon the skill and the learning of the Engineer Department and based upon the wisdom and judgment of the members of the committee.

But we were told that we should bring in a lump-sum appropriation of $7,000,000 for the further improvement, instead of between nineteen and twenty million dollars, and I hope the gentleman will tell us why he selected the arbitrary sum of $12,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. I will yield.

Mr. MADDEN. Is the gentleman prepared to say, in face of the fact that there is a large amount of unexpended balance in the Treasury heretofore authorized and appropriated, that $12,000,000 will not be ample to meet the needs of the coming year?

Mr. SMALL. I am prepared, and I will discuss it shortly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Do I understand that if the gentleman had been chairman of the committee and could control the amount to be appropriated he would have appropriated not less than $25,000,000?

Mr. SMALL. Between twenty-four and twenty-five million dollars, every dollar of which would have been in the public interest and necessary, and with a due regard to economy.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. Is it not true that in response to a direct inquiry made Col. Taylor said that $12,000,000, together with the millions already appropriated and which have been contracted for, together with the millions that have already been appropriated and not contracted for, would be sufficient for maintenance until 1921 on all of the present project debts of the Government?

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman's question is rather involved; but, if I understand him, I did not hear Col. Taylor make any such statement. If the gentleman did hear him, I accept it.

Mr. LAYTON. He made that statement and I heard him make it.

Mr. SMALL. Not in my presence, and I endeavored to be present whenever the committee was in session. Now, coming back, why select $7,000,000 for improvements? Where do you get it? If you want to economize, why did not you make it $4,000,000? If you wanted to economize some more, why did not you make it $1,000,000? If you wanted to cut out all improvements, why not make it $5,000,000 for maintenance alone? Or, if you wanted to be reckless, in a spasm of economy, regardless of the interest of the country, why did not you issue the edict that there should be no river and harbor bill, and rely upon fooling the country by saying you had cut out the pork-barrel appropriation? [Laughter.] Demagogues do that. Of course, none of my friends on that side come under that characterization. [Laughter.]

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman state what the unexpended balances of these appropriations is?

Mr. SMALL. I am coming to that now. Why not make it $15,000,000?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I have just come in, and this question may have been answered. I understand the bill covers lump-sum appropriations. Is that lump sum in the discretion of the engineers to be spread over all existing improvements or limited to any particular improvements?

Mr. SMALL. To be expended in their discretion for the prosecution of such projects heretofore authorized as may be most deserved in the interest of commerce and navigation. Quite a discretion to vest in an administrative officer.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes; and conceivably it might include practically all existing projects, or it might include, in the discretion of some officer, only one or two.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Would not the Chief of Engineers have the same discretion in regard to the expenditure of money already available on these projects?

Mr. SMALL. Those appropriations are for specific improvements.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But he would have discretion as to how much he would expend, or whether any amount or all should be expended.

Mr. SMALL. Yes; you must vest discretion somewhere in the matter of expenditure, but under the law he is authorized to expend the money appropriated for each specific project as soon as it can be done profitably and economically.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman said in answer to some gentleman that under this bill a Member of Congress would have to go abjectly and humbly and ask the engineer if he would spend so much on the project.

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is not that true under the sums already appropriated?

Mr. SMALL. No; Congress has heretofore made specific appropriations for specific improvements, and the money must be expended for that specific project and for no other. Of course, as to how much he shall expend and when, and whether he shall award a contract for a certain amount or decline to award a contract—those are usually administrative functions which must be left to the wise judgment of the engineers.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman made this illustration: Turning to the gentleman from Maryland he said, "How can you tell how much of the $7,000,000 will be expended for Baltimore? You will have to go abjectly and humbly to see how much he will expend." Is not that true as to the sums already appropriated and available for Baltimore?

Mr. SMALL. No; under the policy of the Rivers and Harbors Committtee heretofore adopted, the money is available for each project, and it is a question as to when the Chief of Engineers will expend it. Under this policy the Chief of Engineers has the right to decline to spend 1 cent on the project.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I understood the gentleman to say that heretofore Congress had made appropriations for specific projects. That has not been true always. We have made appropriations of lump sums to be expended in the discretion of the Engineer officers.

Will the gentleman, if he can, say whether, under such circumstances, the Engineer officers practiced any system of discrimination against any project where they have had to make these allotments?

Mr. SMALL. In the 1914 and 1915 river and harbor bills, as I said a while ago, the Senate converted the House bills into lump-sum appropriations, and we were told that we had to pass those bills or none at all. I would prefer that the gentleman did not press me to answer the question as to whether there had been any discrimination by administrative officers in the allotment of those funds.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, I would not wish to embarrass the gentleman; and if it does embarrass him, I will not ask him to do so.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. I would suggest to the gentleman, in reply to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], that where a specific sum is appropriated by a river and harbor bill the obligation rests upon the Chief of Engineers to expend that with all reasonable dispatch. That is a power that must be reposed, because we could not place a time limit upon it; but they would be guilty of failure to discharge an obligation direct on the part of the Government unless they did expend it in a businesslike way and with reasonable dispatch.

Mr. LONGWORTH. In what conceivable way would they be liable?

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. They would not be liable, but they would be guilty of negligence.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Suppose $1,000,000 were appropriated and now in a fund for Baltimore Harbor, is there any obligation that rests on the Chief of Engineers to expend all of that million dollars? Has he not complete discretion as to how much to spend this year or next year?

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. The gentleman will agree with me that where a specific sum is appropriated for a particular purpose, it is an expression of the intention of Congress that that work will be done within a reasonable time, and that that distinct sum must be expended for that purpose.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But who is to judge as to what is a reasonable time except the Chief of Engineers?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, Baltimore would have this situation under the old method—it would know if that specific sum was not expended in the Baltimore Harbor it would not be expended elsewhere, whereas under the proposed arrangement, Baltimore is not sure of getting anything, and the money may be expended just where the engineer pleases, and at any time—the whole sum or a part of it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Has not Baltimore enough to go along on now?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Oh, Baltimore can go along for a few months.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And a few years.

Mr. LINTHICUM. It would not have under this bill enough to maintain the channel, much less to construct more.

Mr. SMALL. I will ask gentlemen to confine themselves to questions.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentlemen are apparently not counting these large sums which are already laid aside, like the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM]. There is over $400,000 to be used on Baltimore Harbor, more than they can expend in the next year.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to say in reply to that, that there is probably $250,000, but estimates are already made for that, and there is a contract out which the gentleman does not figure.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The work has not been done, and the contract has to be performed. In the same way there is something like $10,000,000 which can be used on the Ohio River, and some gentleman a short time ago said that there would not be money enough to carry on the Ohio River projects.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman will have to divide his figures by two in order to approximate the correct amount now available for the Ohio.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Is there a case on record where the money was not expended, where it was appropriated?

Mr. SMALL. I would not say definitely that there has never been any such case, because in a few cases projects were subsequently abandoned and the money was turned back into the Treasury. But I would like to say this to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH]: I take it to be a fair inference from his questions and his statements that he is in favor of lump-sum appropriations not only in this but in subsequent river and harbor appropriation bills.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, no; the gentleman can draw no such conclusion from what I said.

Mr. SMALL. Then, the gentleman would not be in favor hereafter of making lump-sum appropriations and letting the Ohio River take its chance?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Not necessarily. I am appreciating the condition of the Treasury of the United States, for which the gentleman and I are responsible, and I am considering the emergency which we must take into account in respect to the river and harbor appropriation bill.

Mr. SMALL. On the score of economy?

Mr. LONGWORTH. On the score of economy.

Mr. SMALL. I beg a word on that matter of economy before I conclude. We have heard something here about available appropriations. It is said there is $25,000,000 available, which, added to the $12,000,000 appropriated in this bill, makes $37,000,000. Then it is said the average of expenditures has been only so much—less than in any year; and we are informed, with that generous spirit so characteristic of opponents of river and harbor bills, that we will have more than we will really need and can expend. Gentlemen, that is an illusion. That is founded upon no substantial basis. I have not had the opportunity nor the time to add up all of the appropriations which were not expended on November, 1919, but I shall assume that the chairman of the committee or the clerk of the committee was correct and that it is $25,000,000. Where is the $25,000,000? It is the aggregate of specific appropriations which have been made heretofore for specific projects not yet expended. Not one dollar of that can be expended hereafter except upon those projects. Why has it not been expended and why is it available? For various reasons.

Some of it has not been expended because we put a limitation in the last river and harbor act that if the cost of a new project was in excess of 40 per cent above the original estimate the money should not be expended. We have a limitation in past river and harbor acts that if the cost of doing a job by private contract is in excess of 25 per cent more than it would cost by a Government plant it shall not be done. In some instances it has not been expended because during this stress of war we have not been constructing Government dredges and private dredges have been engaged in war work of various kinds. Some of it has not been expended because when proposals were advertised the bids, in the opinion of the engineers, were excessively high, and for various and legitimate reasons in almost every instance there are available balances on hand for various improvements throughout the country which had not been expended on November 1, 1919.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.

Mr. DEWALT. To be entirely fair in your argument, does not this bill, however, on page 8, propose to repeal the section of the former river and harbor act in regard to the 40 per cent provision?

Mr. SMALL. Yes. So that the money will be available on those 17 projects. That does not affect the proposition I was making. I said that accounted in part for the available unexpended balance.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. It does not really make any difference what the reason for the balance is if it is there and available?

Mr. SMALL. Yes. It is available for those specific projects.

Mr. IGOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.

Mr. IGOE. Do I understand you to say that by the passage of this bill, then, that no economy will be achieved, but that the actual expenditure of money would be practically the same? Is that the idea?

Mr. SMALL. No. Of course, it would not be practically the same if we made a larger appropriation.

Mr. IGOE. I understood the gentleman to say that these unexpended balances would be suspended practically during the year; so, as a matter of fact, while there may be a paper economy, that the money paid out of the Treasury would be practically the same.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman's point is well taken. Wherever they can expend during this year on these various improvements throughout the country these available sums, they will be expended, provided they can be expended wisely and economically.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman permit me to ask another question?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.

Mr. DEWALT. Does this $12,000,000, as contained in this bill, have in contemplation any of the improvements that are in this $25,000,000 reserve fund, or, rather, this $25,000,000 unexpended, or is this $12,000,000 entirely exclusive of that?

Mr. SMALL. This $12,000,000 is exclusive of that, except the $25,000,000 has been heretofore appropriated for specific improvements, and this $7,000,000 for improvement and $5,000,000 for maintenance is expended by the Chief of Engineers on any project he chooses to designate.

I want to show to what absurdity this leads us. This bill appropriates $12,000,000 to be expended in the discretion of the Chief of Engineers throughout the country. I endeavored to point out the fallacy of any member of the committee believing that this $12,000,000 was selected or predicated upon any foundation; that you might as well have made it $8,000,000 or $3,000,000 or $1,000,000 so far as the improvement of the rivers and harbors of the country is concerned. You must understand that the estimates submitted by the Chief of Engineers for the ensuing year take into consideration the available balances and the estimates represent the additional sums required.

Now, let me point out further. The Chief of Engineers with his assistants made original estimates of $43,000,000 for maintenance and improvements. The same Army engineers, by direction of the committee, who were acting by direction of the leaders of the House, reduced those estimates to $25,000,000—a reduction from $42,000,000 to $25,000,000—$17,000,000.

Mr. DEWALT. This was all exclusive of the $25,000,000?

Mr. SMALL. Yes; exclusive of the $25,000,000. The gentleman says, and it is just the point I was coming to, that they made those estimates, endeavoring to pare and curtail them to the limit as far as it was safe to go in the public interest and were requested to do it; that they could not be reduced any further, and their aggregate of those reduced estimates was between $19,000,000 and $20,000,000, and yet you want to appropriate $7,000,000 to be expended in their discretion. What discretion?

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. In just a moment. I will yield directly.

What kind of discretion? They have already exercised this discretion twice, namely, in their original estimates, and then when they were told to economize to the limit they have exercised their judgment again. And now, for the third time, you want them to exercise their judgment and divide up this $7,000,000 among the several improvements of the country for their further improvement. Upon what basis shall they fix their judgment? Upon the basis of economy? They have already endeavored to do so.

Upon the basis of necessity and the business interests of the country? They have already exercised their judgment. What kind of judgment, then, will they exercise when they come to this $7,000,000? They will divide it up as best they can—as best they can! And then, if my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. COSTELLO] thinks they have not given as best they could to that great river, the Delaware, he will urge them to give a little more, and he will talk about the merits of that river. They pared to the bone the Ohio River, and, unless my memory misleads me, the ultimate appropriation in the interest of economy which they recommended for the Ohio was $1,000,000. Suppose they do not allot, and they can not allot, to the Ohio $1,000,000 out of this $7,000,000, because if they divided up fairly throughout the country, do their best to divide it up, each project could have only the proportion which 7 bears to 19½, and they give the great Ohio River for further improvement only $100,000; then my distinguished friend from Cincinnati [Mr. LONGWORTH] has urgent telegrams and letters from his constituency saying that the Ohio has been neglected, and he goes and says, "Please make it four or five hundred thousand dollars"—you, a distinguished Member of the House and one of the Representatives of the great State of Ohio, and representing a great constituency, asking an administrative office of the Government to deal fairly with the great Ohio River.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Possibly the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] will give me the benefit of his advice and assistance when that occasion arises.

Mr. SMALL. The advice I would give to the distinguished gentleman may be expressed now: Be a Representative, and subservient to no man in the discharge of the public interest. [Applause.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. The real difference between the gentleman and myself is that in this present exigency which threatens this country I am twice as economical as the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. SMALL. I am going to endeavor in my humble way directly to say whether the gentleman is best serving the country by that economy.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman stated a short time ago that this sum of $7,000,000, which is to be applied generally, was not arrived at in any particular way; that apparently it was merely a guess. I gathered from the statement of the chairman of the committee that they had taken that sum because, after going over the whole improvement, they had considered it to be ample. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] does not have to worry in the least about the Ohio River. They have given all the money there that can be expended. And in going all over these projects, as I understand the chairman of the committee, in nearly all of them they had already as much as they could expend. There are a few, possibly, where they do not have sufficient funds, and to cover that this $7,000,000 was appropriated.

Mr. SMALL. I might quote to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio asking about advice the couplet:

Of all sad words of tongue or pen,
The saddest are these, "It might have been."

So, when the gentleman comes to consider the paucity of the appropriation for the Ohio River later he will have to reflect on "what might have been."

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman will remember the warning of his distinguished friend from North Carolina.

Mr. SMALL. Replying to my distinguished friend from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], neither he nor anyone else could tempt me to say an unkind, critical word concerning the distinguished chairman of the committee. The only regret I have is that we could not bring a bill in here that had the unanimous report of the committee. I think we would have brought in a bill that represented the wisdom and the judgment of that committee—as able a committee, with the exception of your Speaker, as any other committee in the House—if the steering committee had not issued its edict.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly, I yield.

Mr. DENISON. The inquiry that has suggested itself to my mind is this: If the committee was willing to trust absolutely to the judgment of the Chief of Engineers and his officers in distributing this $12,000,000 about the country wherever they pleased, why was not the committee willing to accept or trust the judgment of the engineers in the amount of money that was absolutely necessary to carry on the river and harbor work?

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman refers to the reduced and revised estimate amounting to $19,000,000?

Mr. DENISON. Yes. I would like to have the gentleman's explanation of that.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman is right. This bill proposes to vest discretion in the Chief of Engineers to allot the appropriation in this line. Then why not trust their judgment in the revised estimates they have submitted for each project, which aggregate between nineteen and twenty million dollars?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I take it that the gentleman from North Carolina is going to vote against the bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman from Texas has the habit of asking impertinent questions. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. I want to know what advice the gentleman is giving to his young Democratic minority colleagues on this bill.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman's strong point is not taking advice, but if he will permit me, I will advise him a little later. [Laughter.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. My friend, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON], indicated that the majority of the committee did not follow the advice of the engineers. My understanding is that that is what they did do; that the engineers told them that this is all the money they could expend.

Mr. DENISON. I did not so understand it. If that is true, the country ought to know it. If the engineers said they could expend only $12,000,000, I would like to know whether that is true or not before I vote on this bill.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman who stated that it was Gen. Harry Taylor, the engineer, who made that statement, was mistaken. The Engineer officer, by direction of the committee and with the knowledge of every member of the committee, was directed to cut down every item for improvement as low as it could be done without injury to the public interest, and after making all these reduced estimates they added up to between $19,000,000 and $20,000,000; and how he could have stated that $12,000,000 would be sufficient I do not understand, and I think it would be an insult to the intelligence to credit him with such statement.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. LEA of California. Is it not a fact that the engineer never appeared before our committee at any time after this $12,000,000 was suggested?

Mr. SMALL. He did not.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. SMALL. In just a moment. And this decision of the steering committee was not conveyed to this member of the committee until yesterday morning.

Mr. OLIVER. I am informed that the Chief of Engineers is now prepared to say that if only this amount is carried, it will very seriously interfere with the work of the War Department.

Mr. SMALL. I think it quite probable that he would express that opinion.

Mr. OLIVER. I will say to the gentlemen on the other side, who think it is entirely satisfactory, that it might be well to make further inquiry and see if they were correctly informed.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. If the Chief of Engineers or any one representing him has made the statement alleged, namely, that this $12,000,000 is sufficient for present purposes, ought not that statement, important as it is, to appear somewhere in the hearings?

Mr. SMALL. It ought.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Is there anything like that in the hearings?

Mr. SMALL. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Has the gentleman read the hearings?

Mr. SMALL. The hearings have not been printed yet, so far as I know. Have they been printed?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. They have not yet been. But I want to say that the engineers did not make the statement that $12,000,000 was all that was needed. Gen. Taylor made the statement that $5,000,000 was all they needed for maintenance only.

Mr. SMALL. I said heretofore that the committee had decided on $5,000,000 for maintenance.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I want to say that I was talking to Col. Taylor a few moments ago, and he said that the appropriation of $7,000,000 for improvements would very greatly hamper the work of the War Department, and that he could barely get along with the $5,000,000 for maintenance.

Mr. SMALL. I am very glad to have been interrupted by the gentleman. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 39 minutes remaining.

Mr. SMALL. I must hurry along. I just want to make a comment about this subject of economy: They say that this kind of a bill is necessary for the sake of economy. As I said in the beginning of my remarks—and I repeat it—I realize the necessity of economy, and when the chairman conveyed to us the information that this bill must be reduced to the utmost limit there was no dissent by any Member of the committee. I am pleased to say about the Rivers and Harbors Committee that there is no politics and no sectionalism in the committee. In all the years that I have been on that committee I have never heard a political issue made, and if sectionalism has crept slyly to the front occasionally, it has been so frowned upon that it has disappeared. The committee without dissent agreed that we would report a bill, the lowest bill which was consistent with the maintenance and further improvement of the projects which had been adopted by Congress; and in order not to repeat it at length, I may say that we proceeded to do so, getting the estimates of the engineers for the further improvement of each project, with directions to him and statements by him that the estimates should be made as low as could be made without injury to the public interest.

Upon that he submitted estimates for certain specific improvements between $19,000,000 and $20,000,000 for further improvements. I submit that anything below that is not economy. It is waste.

Then, again, is any other committee of this great body going to be treated as the Rivers and Harbors Committee was treated? Is the steering committee of the House or any leader of the House going to undertake to say to the chairman and to the members of any other committee, "Reduce your appropriations to less than one-third of the estimates or you shall not have any bill"? Forty-two million dollars estimated here and $12,000,000 carried in this bill! Is there going to be any bill for the support of the necessary activities of the Federal Government reduced by lopping off arbitrarily two-thirds of the estimate?

More than that, is there any other bill for the support of a necessary activity of the Government going to have a lump-sum appropriation by direction of the steering committee?

Will it? Not one. Let those who are responsible for this abortion in the way of legislation, in the shape of a river and harbor bill, take the responsibility for it. I wash my hands of it, and I think every friend of river and harbor appropriations and every friend who believes in developing water transportation may in good faith and good conscience do likewise.

The distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] wanted me to give him some advice, and although the temptation is great I am going to confine my advice to this bill. [Laughter.] One of the embarrassments that has come to me is as to how I should vote on this bill.

These distinguished gentlemen—I do not know who they are—said to constitute the steering committee of the majority party of the House, directed that the bill be reduced to a lump sum of $12,000,000, so I am informed, and directed that it be taken up and put under consideration on the following morning, giving no time for members of the committee to devote to it that consideration which it deserves, and it was either this bill or nothing, they said, so I am informed. The issue of duty which confronts me is, shall I vote against it or shall I vote for it and take the best I can get? If this bill fails of passage it means the loss of millions of dollars to the Federal Government. It means the deterioration of Government dredges and other plants. It means the deterioration of channels beyond repair. It means the loss of millions of dollars in handicapping our water-borne commerce; and yet I may bow to the autocrats, and while protesting that you have ordered to be done an indefensible thing, yet if it is all I can get, I advise my distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] that he may vote for the bill, just as I may do. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. I am always glad to take advice from such a distinguished Member as the gentleman from North Carolina——

Mr. SMALL. I yielded for a question, not for a compliment.

Mr. BLANTON. I am going to propound a question. If I should conclude that this is a legislative abortion, as the gentleman from North Carolina has concluded, I am going to vote against the bill; but if it is a legislative abortion, since it is very evident that our friends of the majority are unable to keep their majority here, why not let our minority take a stand here and defeat this bill? We can do it if the gentleman from North Carolina, as ranking Member, sees fit to advise us to do that, because they can not keep sufficient majority Members here to defeat our action if we take the stand.

Mr. MADDEN. Watch us and see.

Mr. BLANTON. You have got to send a lot of telegrams to the big cities to-night if you get them here.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman says he objects to this autocratic decree. The gentleman has been in the House quite a while. Which does he prefer to bow to, the autocratic rule of JOE CANNON or the autocratic rule of an invisible committee that he knows nothing about?

Mr. SMALL. I believe I would prefer UNCLE JOE. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. OLIVER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.

Mr. OLIVER. Is it out of the ordinary for a bill of this kind, passed at the first session of a Congress, to carry an appropriation only up to the following March, and not until the end of the fiscal year?

Mr. SMALL. Since we have been having annual river and harbor bills, with a fair assurance that there would be a recurrence of annual bills, we have in the interest of economy usually at each long session been limiting the appropriation for each project to such amount as could be wisely and economically expended by the following March 4, which is the end of the short session, by which time another river and harbor bill will have been passed.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Is there any authority in Congress or in the law that permits the War Department to create any deficiency in the event that the lump-sum appropriation falls short of the absolutely necessary amount?

Mr. SMALL. No; of course, they are limited by the amount of the appropriation.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Is it a fact that water traffic has been gradually decreasing in spite of all these enormous appropriations?

Mr. SMALL. No; the gentleman is not correctly informed as to that. There is a very interesting publication by the Bureau of the Census, which will soon be available, which shows that there has not been a very large increase in the number of individual vessels, because the number of small sailing vessels has been reduced and large steam-propelled vessels have taken their places; but there has been a substantial increase in the amount of water-borne commerce.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. I am glad to know that.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. The gentleman, who is president of the Waterways Association, is giving his advice. Would it not be better for the House to adopt a substitute for this bill providing reasonable appropriations, by the joint action of the friends of the waterways on the Republican side and on the Democratic side?

Mr. SMALL. I would be delighted to have the opportunity of voting for such a bill properly framed.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] has reference to the Missouri River project, which involves an expenditure of $20,000,000 and does not include a dollar's worth of navigation.

Mr. SMALL. I would remind the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] that no pent-up Utica confines his powers. He is a national statesman.

I am extremely obliged to the Committee of the Whole for their attention. [Applause.]

EXHIBIT A.

JANUARY 20, 1920.

Subject: Value of domestic waterway commerce in the United States.

MY DEAR SIR: Adverting to your telephone request of the 16th instant for data which would indicate the valuation of our domestic waterway commerce in the United States for an annual period, we are submitting herewith a tabulation giving the approximate value of such commerce in the United States during the calendar year 1917.

It will be seen from the statement that the aggregate valuation of receipts and shipments has been computed at an amount in excess of $25,000,000,000. In order to arrive at the net value of the commerce—that is, to eliminate the duplication caused by the fact that the shipments of one district or port become the receipts of another—we have considered one-half of the above amount as indicative of the actual business handled, and which you will notice aggregates around $12,800,000,000.

In explanation of the figures I would say that we have grouped them according to States or districts in so far as possible, but the line can not be drawn too finely, as the commerce of certain waterways in one State often lap over into another State. Certain duplications may have occurred where traffic arriving coastwise at a port was transshipped to the interior by river or canal; but, in any event, such business paid freight on each separate haul, and would therefore be considered new business to each waterway employed. The only way to arrive at the actual valuation of the traffic, counted but once, would be to trace the origin and destination of every individual shipment, which would be a very considerable task. The statistics as submitted were obtained almost entirely from the annual report of the Chief of Engineers for 1917.

Comparison of the valuation of foreign commerce, imports and exports combined, for the calendar years 1917, 1918, and 1919, with the amount of internal traffic our estimate indicates for 1917, reflects the following excess in favor of the latter:

Year.	Total valuation, foreign commerce.	Excess in favor domestic commerce.
		Per cent.
1919	$11,999,178,098	7.4
1918	9,170,300,455	28.6
1917	9,185,080,552	28.5

We shall be pleased to give you any further available data that may be desired on the subject.

Very truly, yours,

BOARD OF ENGINEERS FOR RIVERS AND HARBORS,
By F. T. CHAMBERS,

EXHIBIT B.

Under leave of the House to extend and revise my remarks, I append hereto a substitute for section 1 of the pending bill—H. R. 11892—which I shall offer either in the Committee of the Whole as an amendment by way of a substitute or on a motion to recommit. Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY].

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] was long a distinguished member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. He then became its chairman, and made an able, devoted, and conscientious chairman. He wants the House and the country to appreciate properly at its true value what we propose to do at this time. He is proud of the reputation of the great committee over which he presided and of which he is now the ranking minority member. He wants to preserve the reputation of that committee, and if he will give me his attention I believe that I can convince him that he should never have been more proud of the reputation of that committee than he should be to-day.

Now, let us take the situation. We found ourselves in this position: We found that this country, bowed as it was under enormous burdens of taxation, was yet facing a deficit. We found that in the River and Harbor Committee, different from other committees, there is a system of continuing appropriations. We found that there was on hand as a result of that system not $25,000,000 but about $60,000,000 yet available for the great waterways of this country. With these facts confronting us the question was, What shall this committee do? Well, we did what the gentleman from North Carolina has said. We went through these estimates and took item by item, detail by detail, the estimates of the engineers, and while we had before us at the beginning estimates amounting to $42,000,000, by examination of the engineers, developing the true facts and circumstances, we established beyond controversy, beyond the possibility of debate, that $19,000,000 would in their opinion answer fully all the needs which they had proposed to meet, with the $42,000,000.

Now, let us start from that point and see where we necessarily go. When we came to the estimates of $19,000,000, what did we find? Let us take my own State of New York, the metropolis, of which every man who comes from that great State is justly proud. We found that there was on hand in the Treasury, unexpended, over $4,000,000 for one improvement alone, Hell Gate, which I had the honor to place in a former original bill by my amendment. We found that the engineer still proposed in his revised estimates to add $1,000,000 more. Is there a man who believes that it was necessary? Is there a man who believes that a dollar of the additional million could have been expended if we made every effort in our power to disburse it? I challenge any man to say that the money could have been spent, spending it as rapidly as we were able.

Let us go to the gentleman's own section, the harbor of which the gentleman from North Carolina is so justly proud—Norfolk Harbor. What do we find there? We find that the original estimate was $1,136,000. We found that Norfolk proper had 40 feet, 5 feet deeper than the channels of any harbor of the world except those in the United States. We found that even Thimble Shoals, leading to Norfolk, had 38 feet, 3 feet deeper than any channel except those in the United States. We found that in the revised estimates, in spite of the fact that Norfolk and Thimble Shoals have on hand $1,175,000, in spite of the fact that they have 40 feet at Norfolk Harbor, in spite of the fact that they have 38 feet on Thimble Shoals, that the engineer still estimated in the revised figures that we needed $750,000, or three-quarters of a million dollars, beyond $1,175,000 on hand.

Let us go on and multiply instances. Let us see about this situation and see whether this $19,000,000 was an irreducible minimum, as the gentleman from North Carolina says. Let us take the southern harbors; we have been talking about the northern harbors, except Norfolk. Let us go South and see what we find there. We find Charleston had on hand $1,143,000, and yet the revised estimates demanded $400,000 more.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. No; not now until after I have finished this statement. We find that Savannah had on hand $678,000 and we find that Brunswick had on hand $507,000.

Now, let us take another northern case. There was Pollock Rip Shoals. The revised estimates called for $73,000. They had $199,000 on hand, more than they spent in any one year, and that was not, as the testimony will show, a particularly necessary piece of work.

And so, gentlemen of the committee, we reached the conclusion, the inevitable, necessary, and logical conclusion, taking these figures in detail, going over them item by item, that these revised figures totaling $19,000,000, were just as unnecessary, just as unwarranted, from a financial and business standpoint as the original estimate of $42,000,000.

Now, when we reached that conclusion what did we do? Why, we voted 16 to 1, gentlemen, 16 to 1, regardless of partisanship, we voted 16 to 1, practically a united body, to cut these estimates out and to do what we have done, appropriate $5,000,000 for maintenance and $7,000,000 for improvement, making $12,000,000 in all. [Applause.]

Now, the gentleman from North Carolina went to considerable length and devoted a large part of his speech to the problems of navigation. He talked to you about the fact that we have not sufficient terminals. He should have said that we do not have loading and unloading facilities; he should have said that we did not have transfer and exchange facilities; he should have said that during the entire time that the Government has had control the Railroad Administration has lost money, and has insisted upon absorbing all of the business and taking it away from the waterways.

He should have said that, and he should have said that we are trying to solve this multitude of details, and that before they are solved, before we have some one to look after the waterways and get them business, before we get adequate terminals, before we get loading and unloading facilities, before we get transfer and exchange facilities, we will be unable to get the waterways to carry transportation to their capacity as they should in the interest of relieving the railroads and the people. But that has nothing to do with this bill except that it is an additional argument for being conservative, for being careful, for going slow in the matter of appropriations for waterways, in being sure that you do not tie up and have unexpended the enormous sum of $25,000,000 year after year, year in and year out.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] asked the question and demands an answer, Who is the autocrat who has said we should pass the bill in this form? I am going to answer him; I am going to show him this autocrat; I am going to picture him and bring him on this floor. The autocrat who demanded the course which we followed is the overburdened taxpayer of the United States [applause], groaning under the heavy burden of necessary taxation, and that man, carrying his load with difficulty, moaning because of the steps he took in pain, bearing this heavy burden, came before us, the whole American people, and demanded that we be businesslike and economical. He is the autocrat, and the only autocrat, who demanded the course that we have followed. [Applause.]

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I yield.

Mr. GRIFFIN. The gentleman in calling our attention to the vast sums of money unexpended upon projects already authorized, amounting to over $25,000,000, has made a deep impression upon me. I think it is sufficient reason why we ought not to make a very large appropriation for the carrying on of these projects; but how did the gentleman's committee arrive at the conclusion that $7,000,000 would be an adequate lump sum, or too much or too small an amount, and how is it proposed to expend it?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, the latter part of the question is simply answered. We propose to expend it in just the way we expended the lump-sum appropriations, amounting together to $45,000,000, appropriated in the years 1914 and 1915, and not a man will come upon the floor and point to a single case of complaint in the distribution of that $45,000,000, which was distributed by the Army engineers, as will be done under this bill. That is my answer to that part of the question. In answer to the question how we reached the sum of $7,000,000, I would say that with the utmost care the chairman of this committee took the items for which improvements were recommended and he had them tabulated. He showed in one column the amount of funds on hand and he showed in the next column the expenditures on the projects for the last year. He showed in the following column the average expenditure for five years, and then we went through those items singly, and in every instance where the amount on hand was less than the amount expended last year or was less than the amount expended on the average for the past five years, we added not simply enough to make it equal that amount, but we added something additional so as to be safe, so as to have an element of safety, and then we added up the sums of these excesses and added something again as an emergency fund to that. In that way, in that painstaking, careful, and detailed way we reached that conclusion.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. What objection would there be, then, to saying in the bill how and where it is proposed to expend the $7,000,000? I think the objection most of us have to this is the expenditure of the $7,000,000 in a lump.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Because we found that, in the opinion of the engineers and in the opinion of the committee, after studying the question carefully, we believed we could appropriate a smaller sum in a lump sum than we could by applying it to the various items, and I will illustrate to the gentleman. Only Providence knows where a breakwater will be washed out during the coming year. Only the Inscrutable Will knows where there will be great storms during the period for which we are providing funds. We do know that the average of storms will be about so-and-so, and we know that if we give the engineers liberty to transfer from one fund to another, to expend generally, we do not have to provide against the possibility of storms and unforeseen events in each particular place, but only against the average of events the country over. That is the reason why the appropriation is made in this form.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Has the gentleman advocated that policy heretofore?

Mr. DEMPSEY. No.

Mr. DENISON. Why this year?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, if that question needs answering, I am prepared to answer it. The gentleman says Why this year more than other years? We went into this war with a debt in the millions, and we came out with a debt away up to about $25,000,000,000. We went into the war the least-taxed people in the world, and we have come out of the war bearing what is for us an unexampled load of taxation. Why should we economize now more than at other times? Mr. Chairman, the man who can not answer that question for himself has not kept in touch with human events, he has not read the newspapers from day to day, he has not seen the debt of this country increase and multiply, he has not had the pleasure of paying taxes himself, he has not seen his constituents groaning under taxation which seems bound to increase rather than decrease. The man who needs to ask that question has not lived in this old world of ours; he has lived in another world and has not been conscious of what has been going on on this sphere; he has been buried down underneath the earth 6 or 8 or 10 or 12 feet unable to realize the passage of events as they have transpired from day to day.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman now kindly answer the question that I asked him?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I have answered it fully. I want to say a word in closing. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] has said as an additional argument that other committees have not economized and would not economize. The gentleman from North Carolina has not been in touch with legislation in this body or he would not make that assertion. The very first appropriation bill that came before this House was the Indian affairs bill, and the Committee on Indian Affairs and its able chairman cut down the estimates by about $4,000,000, and yet provided for increased efficiency, and such I believe will be the history of every committee; and if so, this House and the Members of this Congress can go back to their constituents and feel proud of the work which they have well done. [Applause.]

Mr. SMALL. Does the gentleman from Iowa desire to consume more time?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EMERSON].

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, law and order should prevail at all times and under all circumstances, and it is the duty of all parents to teach respect for law and order to their children. We as a Nation must teach respect for law and order, for without law and order this Republic can not exist. As long as laws are upon the statute books they should and must be respected, and it is the duty of the executive branch of the Government to enforce them. Sometimes I feel we have been a little lax in parts of this country in enforcing law and order. If laws are offensive they should not be disobeyed but should be repealed. Since I have been a Member of Congress there have been four important votes on the question of prohibition.

On February 21, 1917, second session of the Sixty-fourth Congress, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 3807, the House voted on a bill to make the District of Columbia dry. I voted for prohibition.

On December 17, 1917, second session, Sixty-fifth Congress, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 469, the House voted on the resolution submitting to the States the question of national prohibition by amendment to the Federal Constitution. I voted for prohibition.

On May 23, 1918, second session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 6977, the House voted on the question of war-time prohibition. I voted for prohibition.

On July 22, 1919, first session of the Sixty-sixth Congress, the House voted on a bill to enforce war-time and national prohibition. I voted for prohibition.

I have voted for prohibition every time I have had an opportunity and shall do so in the future.

Prohibition is now an established fact, and it is the duty of the executive officers to enforce it, and it is the duty of Congress to enact such legislation as is necessary to a proper enforcement of the law. If prohibition is good for America it is good for the world, and it is our duty to use such influence as we possibly can to see that other countries adopt it.

A great deal of the hunger, poverty, suffering, misery, crime, and distress in other countries is caused by intemperance and because men will spend their money for intoxicating liquors instead of purchasing the necessities of life.

I have always been a temperance man personally, because I was taught when I was going to school of the evils of intemperance. In addition to the enforcement of the prohibition law, we must teach the people, and especially the children of this country and of the world, the harm that comes from intemperance.

Among the Christmas cards that I received I prize the following one very much:

The Anti-Saloon League of America wishes you and yours a merry Christmas and a happy New Year.
Greetings from Wayne B. Wheeler and E. C. Dinwiddie.

[Applause.]

Mr. SMALL. Does the gentleman from Iowa wish to proceed now?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Does the gentleman from North Carolina desire to yield time now?

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman has a little more to consume. We have consumed more time than he has.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I want to congratulate the members of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors; I want to congratulate the country; I want to congratulate the Congress on the decision that that committee has reached in presenting this bill. A cut of 71 per cent below the estimates is a pretty severe one. A saving of $30,000,000 below the estimates is worth while even in these days when we are talking in billions. If we can keep up the good work and maintain the standard that this committee has set, this Congress and the membership of this Congress can go home to their constituents with a real valid and substantial claim for further consideration at their hands. For, let it be remembered, that as deep as the cut is in the estimates, as small as the appropriation is as compared with the estimates, in view of the sums now on hand to the credit of the various projects, in view of the fact that the committee has provided its appropriations in the form of lump sums, the total of the bill, as small as it is, will with the available balances care for the legitimate needs of commerce in every port and river of the country.

It is true it does not provide new projects. And I do not believe there is anyone, anywhere, that honestly believes we can in good faith and propriety provide for new projects for rivers and harbors or of any other sort at this time. It does not, it is true, provide specifically for a number of items of development and improvement which are important, but in every case where there are considerable demands for commerce there is a sufficient sum available, unobligated, which taken with a fair proportion of the lump-sum appropriations, such fair proportion as the engineers may provide, will take care of the needs of commerce. Of course, I know the gentlemen on one side will say, "Well, we are not so sure the engineers will take care of our part of the country out of the lump sum," and gentlemen on the other side will express similar doubt. Now, I have faith in the engineers. I believe they will do their duty, and I believe they will use these sums where they are needed, whether it is in the North or South or East or West. And believing that, I believe the committee has done wisely in providing lump-sum appropriations, and I believe it has provided liberally for the needs of commerce the country over.

Gentlemen, let us not forget the condition of the Treasury. I do not care to be continually playing on that string, but that is the most important matter now before us—the condition of the Treasury—the matter of ways and means. Nine billions of estimates, six billions of estimated revenue, and three billions of deficit are staring us in the face. We must economize, and our former colleague, the Secretary of the Treasury, who, I am sorry, is to leave that high office very soon, though I wish him well in the other high position to which he is called, took occasion just a few days ago to again remind us that unless we economize we can not escape a bond issue. He in common with all those who are familiar with the situation realize how unfortunate it would be to have an additional bond issue, large or small.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to a question? I would like to get the answer in the RECORD, and that is why I ask it.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. It has been stated that the committees that were asked to economize were chiefly the committees that made the small appropriations. Now, I would like the gentleman to state here to the membership if the same economy that is taking place now in the Rivers and Harbors Committee has been practiced or is going to be practiced in the other committees having the power to appropriate funds?

Mr. MONDELL. I am sure that every committee in the House is impressed with the necessity of practicing economy, and I am confident that in the case of every bill that is presented, every general appropriation bill that is presented to the House, there will be a very considerable reduction below the estimate, with the two exceptions that I referred to in the course of my remarks some time ago, namely, the Post Office appropriations and the appropriation for pensions. Those two bills can not be reduced below the estimates. But every other bill will be reduced below the estimates. I hope the fortifications bill will be cut even more than the rivers and harbors estimates have been cut, and I hope that between the Navy and the military estimates we can make a saving of pretty close to half a billion dollars or quite half a billion dollars. [Applause.]

The saving of $30,000,000 was quite worth while, but, of course, we will get some very much greater saving, at least reductions below the estimates, when we reach the military bill and the fortifications bill.

Now, returning for a moment to the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, who is constantly urging economy, for which he is entitled to a very great deal of credit, I am sorry that his colleagues in the Cabinet do not follow his good example.

I notice that certain of the Secretaries have said that we must loan $150,000,000 to the people of central Europe. I am not, of course, a member of the committee that will have to pass upon that matter, I may not be fully advised, but I am quite confident that, having said to our creditors in Europe, "We will absolve you for a year from the payment of $475,000,000 of interest due us"; having sold France a very great quantity of supplies, including foodstuffs, at a very low price; having given $100,000,000 of our money a year ago to these people to feed them; having contributed in a very large way in our foreign expenditures toward relieving the situation in Europe, it is about time for us to recall the fact that charity begins at home. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. DAVEY. Will that save the starving children of Poland?

Mr. MONDELL. My dear sir, there never was a time in the history of the world, since this Government was founded—and it is a sad and unfortunate fact—when some one on earth was not starving. There is scarcely a time in our own country when some one, somewhere is not suffering for food. But this is not your money, my friend, and it is not my money.

It is a question as to whether we are justified now in taking the money from the people of this country and giving it, even in the best possible cause, to the people over yonder across the sea. They have neighbors, people who live near them, people who are under very much greater obligations than we are to them; and, God knows, up to this time we have been mighty liberal to those folks over on the other side.

Mr. DAVEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. No; I can not pursue that further. There is endless argument for every charity. If we were to appropriate for everything that appeals to our sympathy we would soon reach the bottom of the Treasury, and the bottom of the pocketbooks of the people of this country. The easy way to do is to say, "Yes; let us do it; let us be liberal." But it is not our money. We can pose as the benefactors of all the world, but we have a very great responsibility in the matter, because, after all, the American people must pay these sums.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one interruption?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman noticed, no doubt, the recommendation of Sir George Paish, that there ought to be an international bond issue legalized by the League of Nations, to amount to $35,000,000,000 to take care of the European situation. That statement was made in New York officially at a group meeting where this matter was discussed. Has the gentleman any suggestions as to what ought to be our attitude on the international bond question?

Mr. MONDELL. I am very well satisfied that Sir George Paish's proposition will not materialize, so far as the American people are concerned. [Applause.] I am satisfied of that. At least we can not do it until the people have given us a commission to do it, and I do not find anything in my commission that authorizes me to participate in any such arrangement as that.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is $150,000,000. Then the Secretary of War cites an additional $15,000,000 for airplanes. Well, we are all interested in the science of aeronautics and we want to appropriate for it reasonably, but I think the $60,000,000 that we have spent directly and the sums that we spend in the various services for the pay of personnel, amounting to quite a number of millions, is sufficient for aeronautics for this particular year of grace.

One Cabinet minister and another is insisting upon increased pay for officers in the various war services, as well as for those in the civil service of the Government. All of these things appeal to us, and appeal to us mightily, and I wish we were sufficiently in funds to provide for all of them. But our duty now, Mr. Chairman, is to economize. We must show a reduction of at least a billion or a billion and a quarter of dollars in the estimates, and we must not, having made that saving, spend enormous sums outside of the estimates, unless we are willing to take the responsibility to tax the people of the country to meet the new obligations. I think that any man who now asks for a large appropriation outside of the estimates should accompany his request with a suggestion of some kind of tax to meet it. [Applause.] I think it is incumbent upon him to do it. If men felt that obligation they would be very much slower than they now are to propose largely increased expenditures. It is all very lovely to talk about appropriating millions for this and for that and the other thing when you have no responsibility with regard to the raising of the money. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr DENISON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I always enjoy hearing the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] talk, and I agree with him entirely in what he says with reference to the necessity for economy. I am very sorry that I can not follow him, my leader, in his support of the present river and harbor bill. I dislike to have to disagree with my majority leader and those associated with him in the management of affairs in the House, as well as with the chairman of the committee. But the chopping off of appropriations for governmental activities does not necessarily mean economy, and gentlemen must not fall into the error of chopping off merely those activities where there are no votes involved under the pretext of economy.

Now, the gentleman from Wyoming has stated that we could not lessen the appropriations in the Post Office Department. Of course, there are a great many voters involved in the Postal Service and in other such governmental activities, but rivers and harbors do not vote. Neither do fortifications.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. And therefore we can chop off all of those appropriations.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. DENISON. No; I regret I can not yield.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think the gentleman ought to make that statement about the post-office business, because that business maintains its own way. It is a work in progress, and it reaches every home in the land, and it ought to be conducted in such a way as to give the people the service which they expect.

Mr. DENISON. I understand that. I understood it before the gentleman made the statement. I am not in favor of chopping off appropriations from the Postal Service. I voted for the Post Office appropriation bill. I am just referring to the statement made by the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DENISON. I am sorry I can not yield.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I was going to ask if he thinks that in view of the appropriations for the Postal Service for the next fiscal year it will continue to pay its way?

Mr. DENISON. I am not sufficiently advised to be able to answer that question accurately.

I feel this way about the bill, that there is no question before the American people to-day of greater importance than the development of transportation, and the business interests of the great Mississippi and Ohio and Missouri Valleys are entitled to some consideration. They are going to pay a good part of the taxes that are required to meet these appropriations and meet the expenses of this Government, and if this bill is enacted into law in the form in which it is reported it will absolutely be a blight upon the business interests of the Mississippi Valley. And unlike the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL], who spoke a few moments ago, my feeling is that if we can not get this bill amended so as to secure sufficient money to continue the work of the development of the Mississippi River and its tributaries, the Members of the House ought to join together and send this bill back, recommit it to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, so that they can give it further consideration and report back a bill for the improvement of the rivers and harbors of this country.

Why, gentlemen, this bill is a misnomer. This is not a bill for the improvement of rivers and harbors. This is a bill for economy. It ought not to have been reported from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. It is going to blight the work of improvement of rivers and harbors instead of encouraging and continuing it. At the proper time I am going to offer an amendment, and I hope the members of the committee who are here present will notice the provisions of the amendment which I am going to offer. I am going to ask the Clerk to read it in my time.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. I am still curious to know where the water traffic is. I have asked a number of gentlemen, and I am going to ask until some one can tell me where our inland water traffic is.

Mr. DENISON. If I had the time I would tell the gentleman. Of course, I realize that the gentleman has not served long in the House, and he is not familiar with the great question of the development of inland waterways. There was not very much traffic on the railroads until we built the railroads, and there never can be very much traffic on the waterways until we get waterways sufficient to carry the traffic. The great trouble about the development of inland waterways has been that we did not go at it in just the right way. We have been expending money to provide deep channels where they could be secured, but we did not make any provision for the building of terminals and for the coordination of rail and water transportation. Now the Congress is getting awake to the importance of this question, and in the railroad bill that has just passed the House, providing for returning the railroads to their owners, we are doing what we should have done years ago. We are providing for the construction of water terminals and the coordination of rail and water transportation. That is going to help encourage commerce, but we can never get river commerce until we get the channels through which it can move and the terminals where it can be transferred. If the gentleman from Nevada or any Members of the House would consult the business men of the country and those who operate the great factories and mills in the Mississippi Valley and the Ohio Valley, they would tell you that the mills and factories are standing idle part of the time to-day because they can not get cars to transport their products, and it is the duty of Congress, it seems to me, to do all it possibly can to hasten the development of the waterways of the country.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. I want my amendment read. I will then be glad to yield to the gentleman from New York, because I want to answer what he had to say a while ago when I asked him a question. First, I will ask the Clerk to read my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read in the time of the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DENISON moves to strike out the first section after the enacting clause, and substitute therefor the following, commencing with line 3:

"That the sum of $12,000,000 be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available and to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers, for the preservation and maintenance of existing river and harbor works, and for the prosecution of such projects heretofore authorized as may be most desirable in the interests of commerce and navigation.

"The sum of $4,000,000 is hereby appropriated for continuing the improvement of the Mississippi River from the mouth of the Ohio River to the mouth of the Missouri River, with a view to securing a permanent 8-foot channel.

"That there is hereby appropriated the sum of $3,000,000 for continuing the improvement of the Missouri River from Kansas City, Kans., from the Quindaro Bend to the mouth of the Missouri, with a view to securing a permanent 6-foot channel.

"That there is hereby appropriated the sum of $2,000,000 for continuing the improvement of the Mississippi River between the mouth of the Missouri River and Minneapolis, with a view to securing a permanent 6-foot channel.

"That there is hereby appropriated the sum of $2,000,000 for continuing the improvements of the Ohio River by the construction of locks and dams, with the view to securing a permanent 9-foot channel from Pittsburgh to Cairo.

"Provided, however, That out of the general appropriation of $12,000,000 herein appropriated the sum of $5,000,000 may be allotted for the preservation and maintenance of existing river and harbor works, and $7,000,000 of said sum of $12,000,000 herein appropriated may be allotted for the prosecution of works of improvement heretofore authorized by Congress.

"Provided further, That allotments out of said general fund of $12,000,000 shall be made by the Secretary of War upon the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers; and

"Provided further, That at the beginning of the third session of the Sixty-sixth Congress a special report shall be made to Congress by the Secretary of War, showing the amounts allotted under said appropriation for each work for improvement and maintenance."

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DENISON. I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. SMALL. I have only 15 minutes remaining, but I yield to the gentleman 2 minutes.

Mr. DENISON. That will serve the purpose of my friend from New York in asking his question, I presume.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Is the gentleman aware that there was on hand in the Ohio River project on the 1st of November $5,900,332? If so, does he think any larger sum should be appropriated to add to that fund, aside from what may be allotted out of this $7,000,000 for improvement and from this $5,000,000 for maintenance? And is the gentleman aware that instead of there being an 8-foot channel from the mouth of the Mississippi to the Ohio there is already a 9-foot channel, so that it is not necessary to provide for the 8-foot channel referred to in the gentleman's proposed amendment?

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman misunderstands my proposed amendment. It makes no provision for that part of the Mississippi River at all. I am aware of all the gentleman says. I believe that if the Government is going to complete a project of that importance they ought to go ahead and do it, just as we did the Panama Canal. We ought not to do it by piecemeal. If we appropriate the money for the project, the engineers ought to go on with the work and complete it as soon as possible, and especially on a project which is of as much importance commercially as this. [Applause.]

Now, there is only about $319,000 available out of funds heretofore appropriated for the improvement of that part of the Mississippi River between Cairo and the mouth of the Missouri. That part of the river is the key to water transportation in the entire upper Mississippi and Missouri Rivers. It needs a lot of work to improve it properly for navigation. The amendment I shall offer will provide $4,000,000 additional funds for that part of the river, and every dollar of it will be urgently needed. I hope the amendment may be approved by the House.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. FREEMAN].

Mr. FREEMAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, this House has been told that we must economize, and the Rivers and Harbors Committee has met that request in a fair and proper manner. The small amount of this appropriation, the annual appropriation of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, this small amount demonstrates that this committee should be called not the pork-barrel committee, but, if we must have a nickname from the hog, we should be known as the spare-rib committee. [Laughter.] You must recognize that this is an exceedingly small appropriation for the annual appropriation of this widely advertised committee.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FREEMAN. I will.

Mr. BLANTON. If this is to be known as the spare-rib bill, coming from the spare-rib committee, shall we understand that there is lots of bone in it but very little meat? [Laughter.]

Mr. FREEMAN. Exactly; we have cut it to the bone, and that is what we propose to do. The situation that confronts this country is this: A great army of 4,000,000 men has been recently demobilized, and yet all these men have found or seem to have found ready employment in the various agricultural, commercial, and industrial pursuits of this country. Labor to-day throughout the country is scarce and wages are very high. The cost of material grows higher and higher, and the price of improvements, public or otherwise, is greater than ever before.

Now, the Rivers and Harbors Committee considered the estimates of the engineers, amounting to $43,000,000 for improvements, and it developed in the hearings that this country, that this Board of Engineers, had at its disposal for existing projects some twenty-five or thirty million dollars already appropriated, available, and as yet unexpended. It also had in addition to that amount, upon other projects, for which additional estimates were not made, a further sum of $30,000,000, making $60,000,000 of available unexpended balances for the coming year up to March 4, 1921. With these facts confronting us, it seemed to be our duty to make this small appropriation for the coming year. We come before this Congress and asked for an appropriation of $12,000,000, and upon the facts presented we confidently expect to receive the hearty support of every Member of the House. [Applause.]

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, how does the time now stand?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina has 15 minutes and the gentleman from Iowa 25 minutes.

Mr. SMALL. I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, it is absolutely impossible to deal in detail with the rivers and harbors bill reported by that committee within the brief period of time at my disposal. There are many things I had hoped to present that seem to be most pertinent to this important measure and which must be left unsaid.

I want to call attention, in passing, to the report of the committee in the closing paragraph:

After carefully investigating each uncompleted project for which an estimate for further improvement is submitted and taking into consideration the existing condition of the channels, the size of the vessels to be accommodated, the amount of the funds remaining available on November 1, 1919, from the appropriation heretofore made, the rate at which expenditures on the several projects have been made in the past, and the desirability of continuing in force the organizations built up by the Government, and continuing the operation of Government plant, your committee has come to the conclusion that the funds on hand, plus the lump-sum appropriation of $7,000,000 made in this bill, will be ample to prosecute these works without deterring the progress toward their completion and without interfering with the needs of the present and prospective commerce.

I challenge the correctness of that statement of the committee, no matter how well intended it may have been. In other words, it is denied by the very report of the Chief of Engineers to the War Department now before the Rivers and Harbors Committee and on file with the committee.

I call attention, Mr. Chairman, to the fact that for the Mississippi River from Cairo to the mouth of the Missouri there remains on hand only $318,891, money available for new contracts and to be expended on that reach of the Mississippi.

Mr. MADDEN. That is on the Mississippi River?

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. That is on the Mississippi River. On the Mississippi River from the mouth of the Missouri River to St. Paul there remains $498,694. Will that fund be effective or adequate for real improvement of the river? On the Missouri River from Kansas City to the mouth there is available $323,029, another mere bagatelle; and I say the money remaining undisbursed for the Ohio River, when you consider the amount necessary to complete the project, is a mere bagatelle. So these great waterways in the Mississippi Valley, a system of waterways unexcelled in the world—yes; unequaled—traversing from every direction the richest valley in the world, the very bread basket of the entire world, populated by people who grow the wheat, who are the bread and food producers, are shamefully neglected by this bill. I wonder what the bread consumers in your markets in the East, your manufacturing centers, who are paying the present high cost for the necessary food products, may think of the lack of transportation that will prevent the delivery to them of those products of the greater Mississippi Valley.

I believe, and I believe it firmly, that the question of transportation is the vital, burning, all-important question that confronts the people of this country to-day. There is none more important, because we must recognize that commerce is the very lifeblood of the Nation, and it must flow over the railways of the country, the roadways of the country, and it should and could flow in a constantly increasing volume over the waterways of the country if improved by the Federal Government. I have not the time to mention the harbors on the Atlantic coast or even those on the Pacific coast, and I am therefore confining my remarks to the waterways of the greater Mississippi Valley. The good Lord blessed that great valley with a system of waterways unequaled, as I have stated, on the globe, and yet man, or, better, the Government, has virtually neglected them all these years, or has done or performed the work just in the careless, makeshift, neglectful, haphazard manner which the present bill, supported by the Republican branch of Congress, proposes to do. No; I am not stating it correctly, for this is the worst bill of all.

If you look at the expenditures that have been made on the Ohio River and the lower Mississippi from Cairo to St. Louis, and the upper Mississippi from St. Paul to the mouth of the Missouri, the Missouri River from Kansas City down, you will find it will aggregate over $132,000,000 for improvement work, exclusive of maintenance. On the Ohio River itself the amount exceeds $62,000,000. The other rivers are as follows: The Missouri River has had expended on it $22,528,000 since the work was undertaken, before the present project was approved. The Mississippi River, from Cairo to the mouth of the Missouri, $19,166,599. The upper Mississippi, $31,180,000; and those three rivers exceed a total of $72,874,000, which, added to the $62,000,000 of the Ohio, makes the total of more than $132,000,000. This work has been done, and you are letting it stand idle. You are losing the interest on the investment; you are permitting the work and Government plants to deteriorate; you are appropriating a mere bagatelle to be distributed to all the harbors of the country and to all the waterways of the country. I have failed to hear to-day a single supporter of this bill point out any river appropriations that are unexpended. I would like to hear the statement now where there is any sufficient amount unexpended for a river in New York or on the Pacific coast or in the Mississippi Valley.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. There is $5,000,000 of the Ohio River fund—more than that.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. It is $4,702,589.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I beg the gentleman's pardon. There are a lot of funds under the heading of contract obligations that are available to pay for work to be done from now on on the construction of dams on the Ohio River.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. I get the information from the Board of Engineers, and they give it at $4,702,589. That is a mere bagatelle compared to the work yet to be done on the Ohio to avoid the loss of the money already expended. The Government has expended over $62,000,000 on construction of work for that river. It has constructed dams above Cincinnati one after the other, and they are absolutely useless unless the project is completed.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. I would gladly yield, but I have not the time. Yet, as I have said, you permit that work to stand there neglected, unimproved, and lose the interest on that vast investment.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. I would if I had the time. Give me the time at the end of my remarks and I will gladly yield. Your present rivers and harbors bill is not economy. It is false economy to say that you will not improve the waterways of this country, that you will not keep up your harbors. You might with equal reason and logic say that you will abandon the railroads, the waterways, and roadways of the country because expenditures in the past have been large, because the war expenses have been great, that you are not interested in developing and enlarging transportation facilities.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have been greatly surprised by some of the statements that have been made by self-proclaimed friends of railways. I am necessarily compelled to confine my remarks for want of time, as I have said, to the waterways of the Mississippi Valley, and before entering upon the discussion of some of the matters which have been mentioned here I want to direct attention to the deterioration which occurs to the reaches of the river from the mouth of the Ohio to the mouth of the Missouri—the Cairo district, as it is called. The report of the Engineers, on page 1226, says:

> Because of the small and insufficient appropriations for this district in recent years many important regulation works have deteriorated rapidly, some having been entirely destroyed, and their repair and restoration is now urgent and necessary in the interests of navigation, just now greatly revived and stimulated by the new Government barge line between St. Louis and New Orleans, the Mississippi River section of the Mississippi-Warrior waterways, United States Railroad Administration. Due to the loss of these works at several localities the river is again becoming excessively wide (a mile or more), and unless necessary sums for such restorations and channel corrections are made available radical increase in the purely temporary dredging work, with attendant increase in plant and operating expense, must be expected and provided for.

Here is the report of the Board of Engineers, reported to the Secretary of War, and in turn it reaches Congress, to the effect that that important reach of the Mississippi River is deteriorating and being destroyed. Why? Because of the meager appropriations which have been made in the past. And yet, in spite of that, it is proposed in this rivers and harbors bill to radically cut down or shade—yes, virtually eliminate—those appropriations which the Board of Engineers have characterized as "insufficient."

That is one item. Now, I do not believe in discussing before this great tribunal—because Congress is the great legislative tribunal of this country—individual propositions, and while the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has said that I "descanted eloquently" upon the Missouri River, I direct the attention of the gentleman to my remarks in the RECORD, and he will find out that he is mistaken in that respect. I spoke of the Missouri River in connection with the upper Mississippi and the Ohio and also the lower Mississippi and its connection with the Chicago to the Mississippi waterway because I am as heartily in favor of one as the other. I believe in that great system of waterways, and I believe in it firmly. I believe that the greater Mississippi Valley will not reach its highest destiny until those waterways are developed.

The business men in these great cities at the termini of those rivers at Pittsburgh, at St. Paul, at Minneapolis, at Kansas City, and at St. Louis and intermediate points, and the lowest point, New Orleans, all of those business men now, when the shortage condition relating to cars and equipment is accentuated as it is to-day, as well as the people generally, are crying from every section of this country for cars and for additional transportation facilities. Business is being relatively stifled. Those gentlemen realize that the only quick medium of relief is by the development of the inland waterways of the country. And yet here is a crumb thrown by an insufficient bill, appropriating an amount which the Board of Engineers, even when they were crucified and forced to scale down their respective recommendations, have said is insufficient.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. I regret I can not. At the conclusion of my remarks, if he requests, I want to yield to the chairman of the committee. He has been most considerate and courteous, and I am sorry he has taken part in committing this serious mistake, because it is a most serious mistake.

Let me speak for one moment—and I would not do so except for the attacks which have been made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR]—on the Missouri River, which is one of the noblest streams that God ever made. Ten years ago we came before Congress requesting the approval of a project to improve and complete that stream from Kansas City to its mouth, at a cost of $20,000,000. We went back home with the promise to the River and Harbor Committee that we would raise a million dollars capital in public subscriptions to build boats and barges on that stream. We exceeded our promise. We secured a million two hundred and thirty-eight thousand dollars in subscriptions to our capital stock. We pioneered in boat building and in barge building to develop the proper types, and how successful we were is evidenced by the fact that with slight modifications the types of boats and barges which we developed, after much experimentation and a very large expense, have been adopted by the Government in building their new boats and barges for use by the United States Railroad Administration on the Mississippi River. We departed from the old type of boats which carried their own freight and their own fuel. We constructed steel-hull power boats with high-power triple-expansion condensing engines. The boats were equipped with twin-screw propellers, protected by tunnels in the hulls. We also developed the type with stern wheels. The fuel was oil; and thus space, weight, and bulk was economized, and the fuel, by the establishment of oil stations of supply along the river, was easily obtainable. We built steel-hull barges, virtually nonsinkable, as they were constructed with water-tight compartments.

The superstructure of these barges was inclosed in steel cargo boxes, to increase carrying capacity, with top opening doors through which freight shipments were loaded and unloaded by means of modern electrically operated hoists at Kansas City and St. Louis. We established at Kansas City and at St. Louis wharves equipped with modern electrically operated terminal equipment or machinery, thus eliminating the expense of roustabout labor, and our warehouse at Kansas City was equipped with the overhead Tellefer system, enabling us to transfer freight from one point to the other at the minimum cost. It is apropos to state here that St. Louis is now completing extensive wharves or docks built of concrete and equipped with all modern terminal facilities at a cost of several hundred thousand dollars. The knowledge which we secured by scientific investigation as well as by practical experience we distributed without charge to all inland waterway communities and civic organizations expressing a desire to possess the same. After all these years of effort and earnest and effective endeavor on the part of the business men and citizens of Kansas City, and particularly of those directly charged with the responsibility of securing terminals and constructing and operating boats on the Missouri, it comes with ill grace from any individual, whether he be Congressman or plain citizen, who has never contributed by word or deed to the laudable and patriotic purposes of using the inland waterways of that great valley to the benefit and advantage of not only the producers but the consumers of this country, to decry and ridicule and, so far as possible, to destroy the result of those patriotic efforts.

It is asked to-day, Where is the commerce on the Missouri River? If you will examine the report of the Board of Engineers just made, it will disclose that there are bars or crossings in the Missouri River which should have been removed long ago, if the project which was approved in 1910 had been expedited to completion. At page 1285 the Board of Engineers states:

The river—

is practically in its original condition, with a depth of 3½ feet at mean low water between Sibley and Waverly. The stretch from Waverly to Glasco, a distance of 61.5 miles, is the most unstable section of the river; two crossings had as little as 3½ feet depth.

The Board of Engineers also directs attention to the fact that from Glasco to Nigger Bend the required depth prevails, except at one crossing, where a depth of 3½ feet was found, and further says, page 1286:

From Nigger Bend to Rocheport, a distance of 27 miles, two crossings were found with a least depth of 3½ feet.

Also in the reach from Washington to St. Charles three crossings exist where there is a depth of 3½ feet. And again from St. Charles to the mouth two crossings have a depth of only 3½ feet. I could direct attention to other crossings of the river which should be removed cited in the report of the engineers, and which to-day afford an insufficient depth for navigation. My proposition is that if Congress had supplied adequate and sufficient appropriations to complete the approved project within the 10 years proposed, and as could very readily and easily have been done, the entire reach of the river, from Kansas City to the mouth, would to-day be finished, and a channel ranging from 8 to 30 feet have been secured. Boats and barges would be plying up and down the stream, and an exchange of barges could be effected with the line of boats and barges operated by the United States Railroad Administration, and to which I have just referred, and deliveries without breaking bulk could have been made for delivery to New Orleans, to be transferred to ocean-going vessels, not only for our domestic trade on both coasts but for export, and millions of car-miles could be saved and cars released to meet the pressing necessities which to-day exist everywhere in this country.

For 10 long years we have operated boats and barges upon the Missouri River, over bad crossings, and at a differential freight rate 20 per cent less than the rail rate. We have operated at a profit when the channel was at proper water stages, and have operated at a loss when we have had to nose on and back off of the sand bars which were caused by the river being uncompleted. The shallowest crossings in the channel of the river over which we were compelled to float our commerce fixed and determined the carrying capacity for the entire Kansas City-St. Louis reach of the stream, and at low water we were necessarily compelled to load light and therefore increase our per cent in cost of operation as compared to the commerce carried.

The experience of the business men of Kansas City has demonstrated beyond any question of doubt that the Missouri River, when improved, can be made one of the great arteries of commerce, and when statements are made by Members of Congress that it is incapable of improvement, that the proposition is not a practicable or feasible one, I am constrained to say that these statements are based upon either ignorance of the real situation or a total misapprehension of the facts. The Missouri River has been surveyed, resurveyed, and reresurveyed not one or two or three or four times but many times, and it has been determined by the best engineering skill we possess that it is both practical and feasible to improve the channel. Conclusive evidence is furnished by the work of the Missouri River Commission during a period of time from 1892 to 1901. The worst reach of the Missouri River for a distance of 45 miles, extending from Murrays Bend, just above Jefferson City, to the mouth of the Gasconade River, was improved. The river was confined to an average width of 1,200 feet, and scoured out its sandy bottom to a depth varying from 10 to 30 feet. Understand, this was the worst reach of the river, having a low-water depth as low as 2½ feet prior to the improvement. The work was done through diking and revetting an average period of 24 years ago, and to-day the work stands substantially intact. Does it not necessarily follow, then, that if the worst reach of the river could be made navigable and with a permanently fixed, improved, and sufficient channel for navigation purposes, the other reaches of the river, and not so difficult to improve, where crossings of shallow depth exist, could be just as well and permanently improved, and when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] states that the Missouri River is in one State to-day and another State to-morrow he speaks without the facts to support his statement, and if he goes further and says that the river is not susceptible of permanent improvement he squarely opposes the opinion, and that, too, after repeated examinations, of the best engineering skill this country possesses.

When the last hearing, in 1915, was had as to the feasibility and practicability of improving the river the full Board of Army Engineers, Gen. Black presiding, sat for several days at Kansas City and an extended hearing was had and decision emphatically favorable. So much, then, as to the improvement of the river and as to its being made a navigable stream with a fixed, permanent, and dependable channel.

The community which I represent has done more to keep alive the spirit favoring inland waterway navigation than any other inland waterway community in this country. We have to-day in our hands a cash fund which we are ready to invest in boats and barges whenever the Government will give us a channel, which it is within its power and its obligation to do, and we will use the river not only to the benefit of the local inhabitants, but to the benefit of the consumers of the necessary products of that valley in the great manufacturing centers of our country, where consumption of those products must be supplied at fair and reasonable prices. We are not only ready but we are anxious and willing to invest that money in boats and barges to move the freight up and down the Missouri River and to deliver our barges to the Mississippi River line for transportation to New Orleans.

Under the stress and necessities of war and the consequent imperative demand for larger transportation facilities the United States Railroad Administration, after a full hearing in Washington, which was attended by representative business men from all parts of the great Mississippi Valley, decided to purchase all barges and power boats obtainable for use upon the lower Mississippi, and also additional equipment of boats and barges for use upon the Mississippi from St. Louis to St. Paul. To that end contracts were let aggregating $6,240,000 for power boats and barges upon the lower river and $3,360,000 for boats and barges upon the upper Mississippi. The latter appropriation was later increased by the sum of $500,000, thus making a total expenditure for a fleet of boats and barges to be used upon the Mississippi of $10,150,000, all of which are contracted for and many of them delivered.

In order to obtain a preliminary equipment, boats and barges already constructed were purchased elsewhere, and the fleet of boats then being operated upon the Missouri by the Kansas City (Mo.) River Navigation Co. were virtually commandeered by the Government and transported to the Mississippi, because it was thought by the Federal representatives a larger use could be secured by reason of the deeper channel on the lower Mississippi. I hope this statement will be carried in mind, because I desire to refer to it later.

We stand to-day on the eve of a great commercial and industrial era which must follow when business resumes normal condition. Europe, with depleted man power and reduced productive capacity, will demand and must have our surplus products from farm and factory. Our transportation facilities will be tested as never before. The railways of this country are confronted by a condition which is alarming and critical, and neither the time, men, money, and material can be secured to keep pace with the constantly expanding commerce and consequent transportation necessities. We are blind indeed to the interests of our great country if we are unwilling to use the great instrumentalities of commerce—our waterways—to the utmost by failing to provide the money necessary to put those waterways in condition to be used at the earliest practicable moment possible.

The distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL], who, prior to the present term of Congress, served as chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, characterized this bill as an "abortion," and as he thought of the wonderful results which might have been accomplished he stated that he was reminded of the old couplet—

Of all sad words of tongue or pen,
The saddest are these, "It might have been."

And if the gentleman had carried the thought further and considered not only the benefits which might have resulted to the whole country if a well-considered and wisely constructed rivers and harbors bill had been reported, but had only viewed the present bill as it is drawn and which he has characterized as an abortion, he might well have added:

But sadder yet, as you will see,
Are these, "It is, but hadn't orter be."

The strongest indictment which can be brought against this bill is the one that grows out of the very facts and not based upon any sentimental declaration.

I have already given the figures showing the amount of money remaining on hand for the Missouri River, the reach of the Mississippi from the mouth of the Missouri to Cairo, the reach of the Mississippi from the mouth of the Missouri to St. Paul, and the Ohio River, as well as the total expenditures made upon those rivers.

The Board of Engineers, in their report, Document 427, Sixty-sixth Congress, second session, recommend $5,000,000, exclusive of all funds on hand, as the amount which can be profitably expended in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, for new work on the Ohio River, and estimate that the amount required for the completion of the existing project is $20,265,488—see report, page 1380. For the Mississippi River, from Cairo to the mouth of the Missouri, $750,000, in addition to all available funds on hand, and the fund on hand December 1, 1919, was only $319,891. The amount necessary to complete the project is $16,000,000—see report, page 1227. For the Mississippi River, from the mouth of the Missouri to St. Paul, to be used during the fiscal year 1921 for new work, $2,000,000, while there was on hand December 1, 1919, only $498,694. The amount necessary to complete the project is $7,185,000—see report, page 1240. For the Missouri River, from Kansas City to its mouth, for new work and maintenance, the Board of Engineers recommend $2,100,000, while there was on hand on December 1, 1919, only $323,029, and the amount necessary to complete the project the Board of Engineers estimate to be $11,800,000—see report, page 1291. And yet in the face of these figures the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has reported that "after a careful investigation" of each uncompleted project the amount of funds remaining available on November 1, 1919, from the appropriations which have been made will be ample to prosecute the work to completion without deterring its progress. The very statement of the figures, I say, is a refutation of the position taken by the committee in its report and discloses its utter absurdity. For years and years practical, hard-headed, farseeing business men, representing commercial houses and manufacturing interests, have left their representative places of business and journeyed from every part of these United States to meeting after meeting, convention after convention, to develop and create a sentiment in favor of the larger use of the waterways not only in the greater Mississippi Valley but in other sections of the country. They have spent their time and money because they possessed a true vision, built upon their practical experience, of the journey our country is entering. They realized more and more that the railway situation of the country was becoming critical and more acute. They realized that commerce was expanding with tremendous bounds, and that there was a constantly increasing demand for transportation facilities, and that sooner or later progress and development would be halted unless additional avenues for commerce or transportation facilities were developed, and if this proposed rivers and harbors bill is enacted into law it will come as a distinct shock and serious injury to the various business interests, commercial and manufacturing, represented by those men.

Their hopes for a coordination and cooperation of railway and river lines with joint proportional rail and river rates were about to be realized. During the war the United States Railroad Administration in a large section of the country established joint rail and river rates, with the result that inland cities located at distances from the waterways obtained the benefit of the river rates. One concrete example of this may be given. At one time, comparatively recent, there was brought up the Mississippi River by Government barges and boats 79,600 bags of sugar, and of that quantity 20 per cent only, or 16,000 bags, were consigned to merchants at St. Louis, while the remaining 80 per cent, or 63,600 bags, went to merchants in inland cities, and this was made possible by joint river and rail rates, thus affording to the inland merchants the differential rate of the river. If the great waterways of the Mississippi Valley which I have mentioned were developed, they would, beyond question, be used; and if so used, the benefits of joint proportional river and rail rates would be extended to the inland cities of Missouri, Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, Oklahoma, and, in fact, all of the cities located at distances from the waterways; and this same argument would apply to inland waterways in the other States of the Union, and saving of cars and car miles would be felt beneficially everywhere.

We are to-day proclaiming far and wide that the most potent factor in reducing the burdensome and increasing cost of living is increased production, but we are not providing carrying facilities for the present production and business, much less an increased volume, and in addition to that it is a duty and obligation to supply transportation at the minimum cost. To-day, so far as transportation is concerned, we measure distance not in miles but in dollars and cents, and with our great system of waterways—and I mean the projects which have been surveyed, thoroughly examined, and approved—we can supply mediums of transportation at the relative minimum cost. Such action would benefit the farmers and producers in the great agricultural States of Minnesota, Iowa, Nebraska, Illinois, Indiana, Missouri, Oklahoma, Ohio, and other States too numerous to mention, to which not only we in this country must look for sustenance, but toward which the peoples of the world are hungrily and anxiously turning their faces and with outstretched hands pleading for food to avoid starvation and death.

Ah, Mr. Chairman, it is a sad spectacle indeed—and I am still looking at the greater Mississippi Valley—to view those wonderful rivers—the Ohio with its source of navigation at the great mart of Pittsburgh; the upper Mississippi at Minneapolis and St. Paul, the first milling center of the country; the Missouri at Kansas City, the third milling center of the country, and perhaps the deep waterway from that great trade center, Chicago, to the Mississippi—and think of the long neglect and misuse made of those waterways over which there could be flowing to-day millions of tons of water-borne commerce which could be distributed to the needy markets of this country and the world at the lowest possible cost, either via the Atlantic or through the Panama Canal to Pacific or foreign ports. And right here, Mr. Chairman, the people of that greater valley gladly responded to the demand made upon them by the Government for their portion to construct the Panama Canal, and instead of being a benefit to that section that great canal is an injury. When the ocean-going vessels released from overseas service resume their coast-to-coast trade, intercoastal rates will necessarily be reduced, while the immediate prospects are that rail rates, which have already been advanced, will be raised still higher, and the position of the producers and of the commercial and manufacturing interests in the interior will become relatively worse.

Yes, Mr. Chairman; it is a sad commentary upon our foresight and our wisdom to view the long neglect of those splendid waterways which should to-day be completed and used for freight carrying purposes. It is reliably estimated that the greater Mississippi Valley, with its 1,980,000 square miles, with its soils richer than the fabled valleys of the Nile, yielding all the products known to farm and plantation, with its soil first enriched by marine deposits before the recession of the ocean then by glacial action, then, in part, by the Gulf of Mexico, then by centuries of washings from the mountains, and possessing a variety, quality, and fertility unequalled, with a potentiality to support on the basis of population of some of the European countries 600,000,000 people, and it can only secure its highest development by and through the use of its wonderful waterways.

Of the commodities demanded by mankind it produces over 70 per cent of the wheat, corn, cotton, live stock, iron ore, lead, zinc, and other commodities and staples of the entire Nation. There in the center of our country, between two great mountain ranges, gradually sloping or grading from the north and from the mountains on the east and west to and down "The Father of Waters," it has been designedly adapted by nature for carrying by water over the Mississippi and its great laterals, almost by gravity alone, its fabulous and infinite surplus production to all markets. In that great valley the center of production and the center of population is concentrated, and with its magnificent rivers improved and teeming with the commerce growing out of its wonderful production the mind of man can not conjure or conjecture the results; but if this bill is to be the declared policy of Congress, then a blight will be cast upon that valley; in fact, if this bill is passed as now drawn it should, and will, bring upon it the condemnation of the producers and of the business interests of the valley. If the work is to be done it should be done now; the necessity has been never so pressing and never so great. It should be taken up and prosecuted with the same vigor, the same energy, the same dispatch, and with adequate funds, just as was done in the case of the Panama Canal, to the end that further waste and loss by deterioration, damage, and misuse may be avoided, and in order that benefits may be derived from the vast sums of money already expended.

Is it the part of wisdom and economy to procrastinate longer, to enact a "make believe" and grossly inadequate measure like this proposed rivers and harbors bill now reported by that committee, to commit such a travesty under the guise of a pretended and false economy, and to the injury and loss of production and commerce now demanding increased, adequate, and economical transportation?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. NEWTON].

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the greatest problem which to-day confronts the American people is the problem of transportation. The revenues of the Nation depend almost entirely upon the commerce of the country. Commerce can not and will not develop beyond the transportation facilities available, and the only substantial transportation facilities available to-day are those afforded by the railroads. There has not been a railroad of any consequence constructed in the United States in the past 10 years, and I am told that the railroad mileage in the United States is less to-day than it was two years ago, certain small lines having been abandoned under Federal operation. I know of no capital in this country seeking investment in railroad construction, and I do not believe there is any private capital available for that purpose. Yet commerce has grown and developed until the railroads are totally inadequate to meet the demands made upon them.

I think there is no one better advised as to the railroad situation in this country than Samuel O. Dunn, editor of the Railway Age, a publication of authority among the railroads. On the 17th of November, 1919, Mr. Dunn gave an interview to the Post-Dispatch of St. Louis, in which he said:

> If every locomotive plant in the country should operate at capacity for three years, if all the railroad material shops should work at top speed for three years, at the end of that time they would enable the railroads to do no more than catch up with the demands of business made upon them. The railroads at this moment are three and one-half years behind in equipment and other facilities. With the country spending a billion dollars additional every year for three years, and with the best and most efficient management obtainable and imaginable, they could not handle the business.

Mr. Dunn's statement reveals an amazing transportation situation, and yet I doubt if there is a man on the floor of this House who is surprised at its import, or who would attempt to contradict the truthfulness of his assertions.

In order to ascertain the true transportation situation in my home city, St. Louis, I wrote a letter about 10 days ago to each of 125 large shippers in that city, making inquiry as to whether or not the railroad facilities now available are adequate to meet the demands of their various business enterprises. No shipper was advised that another had been communicated with, and the answer in each case was spontaneous. I have had replies to most of the letters, and with only one exception I am told that these leading industries have been unable to procure adequate cars to properly carry on their business. The one exception is a large tie company, which asserts that it has experienced no difficulty in procuring adequate car space for its goods, and that it could not use a barge line to advantage. It is probable that the railroads give preference to ties used in repairing of their tracks. It is also possible that it might occur to a tie dealer that ties are not essential to transportation on the waterways.

I presume that the congestion of transportation is no worse in St. Louis than it is in other sections of the country, and in order to bring the Members of the House in more intimate touch with the deplorable conditions prevailing there, I desire to read short extracts from a number of the letters which I have received.

I received a letter from the Steinwender-Stoffregen Coffee Co., one of the largest coffee houses of that city, in which they say:

> So far as railroad facilities are concerned, the delay which our shipments are now suffering in New Orleans are almost unbearable. We have had cargoes in that port that have been held up all the way from two to six weeks before carriers could provide equipment to move them.

The Western Furniture Co. writes as follows:

> It has occurred time and again that we were prevented from making shipments on account of the refusal at depot platforms to take more freight, thereby curtailing movement and making additional cost by rehauling. There have been times, due to car shortage, when our goods consigned to pool cars have lain on the transfer platform from 7 to 14 days; in fact, this is a weekly occurrence.

The Broderick & Bascom Rope Co., one of the largest wire-rope manufactures in St. Louis, writes:

> The available railroad facilities are most certainly inadequate. Cars that should reach destination in a week or less are two or three weeks, and many times four or five weeks, en route. For example, a shipment of wire rope from Liverpool has reached St. Louis in five weeks' time via New Orleans and the Mississippi River, and it takes five weeks and more for cars to reach us from points in this country.

The J. H. Teasdale Commission Co., dealers in grain, feed, hay, and mill products, say in their letter:

> Railroad facilities have been wholly inadequate in our business during the past year and more to such an extent that at times and for considerable periods we have been compelled to cease buying and selling entirely owing to the impossibility of securing cars for transportation of grain. At the present time our business operations are reduced fully 75 per cent on account of the shortage of cars.

The Kehlor Flour Mills Co., one of the largest flour institutions in the city, writes:

> We have not and can not get sufficient railroad equipment to handle our business. Our mill is now shut down on this account. We have something like 250,000 bushels of wheat in Chicago, and we can not get the cars to move the wheat to St. Louis. Our mill is, therefore, shut down.

The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], the leader upon this floor, pleads for economy and tries to justify the provisions of this bill upon that ground. I agree with him that, taking into account the great burden of debt resulting from the war, we should avoid every needless expenditure, but I deny his contention that an expenditure for the improvement of our waterways, which will open them for navigation, thereby relieving the congestion of transportation, is a needless expenditure. I deny that a policy which fails to develop our transportation facilities to such an extent as to enable our commerce to develop and grow is based upon sound economy. The taxes which we collect from incomes constitute one of the greatest sources of revenue which this Government enjoys, and a policy which stifles commerce by refusing to furnish transportation, thereby curtailing the incomes of the country, is certainly not based upon a wise and sound economy.

There is one kind of economy which impels us to hold money in the Treasury with an iron grip and to dole out sparingly and grudgingly the sums which the dire needs of the country compel us to expend. There is another kind of economy, based upon good business sense, which by developing the industries and commerce of the country enables us to fill the Treasury with abundant funds with which to amply provide for the country's needs. In my judgment this is the kind of economy which the people want. If large shippers, such as these from whose letters I have quoted are afforded adequate transportation facilities, their merchandise will develop and grow and their incomes will increase until they will pay millions in income taxes into the Treasury of the United States. Is it economy to curtail their incomes by failing to provide means of transportation for commerce, thereby depriving the Treasury of millions in taxes, which would far exceed the cost of these river improvements? If that is economy, then I fail to comprehend the meaning of the term.

Another inquiry which I made in my letter to the large shippers of St. Louis was to what extent, if any, they would be able to utilize in their business barge lines, if established. In more than three-fourths of the answers it is stated that barge lines could be used to a very great extent, and if established would do much to relieve congestion in transportation. I desire to quote from two or three letters on this point. The Marshall-Hall Grain Co. writes:

> Since the inauguration of Government barge service, September, 1918, we have loaded to barges for New Orleans a total of 1,277,181,300 bushels of grain.

The Philip Gruner & Bros. Lumber Co., one of the largest lumber dealers in St. Louis, writes:

> If navigation is made possible and barge lines established on the Mississippi River, will say that we figure that 50 per cent of our business can be handled through this medium.

The Kehlor Flour Mills Co. writes upon this point:

> We manufacture daily 3,000 barrels of flour. About 50 per cent of this goes for export. In other words, we have seven or eight cars of flour for barge lines per day. We also manufacture five cars of mill feed per day. A great deal of this goes to New Orleans and other lower Mississippi points. So we believe we can safely say that we could furnish the barge lines 8 or 10 cars of mill products per day.

I regret that I have not the time to quote from other letters which I have received from sugar companies, screw companies, wire-rope companies, tile companies, fire-brick companies, grocer companies, lumber companies, hay and grain companies, flour mills and feed companies, and other industries of St. Louis, all expressing a desire for an opportunity to procure relief from freight congestion through barge-line transportation.

The question, perhaps, of the greatest concern to the American people to-day is that of the "high cost of living." Under the laws of supply and demand the supply available at the point of demand governs the price at that point. There may be in the country an abundance of every commodity to supply the people's needs; yet if facilities for transportation are inadequate to keep that supply at the point of demand, prices will be high, and there is no doubt but what the present high prices are largely due to that condition. For instance, the lumber people tell me that there is an abundance of lumber at the mills in the forests, but that sufficient cars are not available to haul it to market. Therefore the price of lumber is higher than ever known. Yet the incomes of lumbermen are being curtailed because of the limited amount of sales.

The Committee on Rivers and Harbors stands sponsor for this bill. The members of the committee are able and conscientious men, and it is to me a source of real regret that I am unable to concur in their report. Had they gone more fully into the matter and given us more extensive hearings, I am sure their conclusion would have been different. They tell us that the bill provides adequate funds to keep improvements already made in repair and to carry on the projects heretofore undertaken, and in support of this contention they quote Gen. Taylor, of the Army Engineers, though it has been denied upon this floor that this statement correctly defines the attitude of the general upon this question. They tell us that there is an unexpended balance of $25,000,000 in the Treasury heretofore appropriated for river improvement, which is all that the Army engineers will be able to expend until the next appropriation is made, some eight months hence. But I deny that available funds appropriated for the Missouri and the Mississippi Rivers are adequate to carry on improvements. Of the twenty-five millions heretofore appropriated and relied on by the committee as an excuse for this bill, the records of the War Department show that there is available on the Mississippi River between St. Paul and St. Louis only $498,694, while there is available on the Mississippi River between St. Louis and Cairo only $319,891, which is $30,000 less than was necessary to make repairs during the past fiscal year, without any provision for improvements. And upon the Missouri River there is available for use between Kansas City and St. Louis the sum of $323,029, which is not more than enough to make repairs on improvements heretofore made, leaving nothing with which to carry on new work.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Of course, the gentleman understands that more of this $5,000,000 for maintenance could be used to maintain the channel depth between St. Louis and Cairo?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I know, but when we take into account that $5,000,000 is all that is being appropriated for the maintenance of all the rivers and harbors in the United States, it is probable that very little of such sum will be expended upon the Mississippi and the Missouri Rivers.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I want to say to the gentleman that there are $12,000,000 in project funds at the present time that can be used for maintenance. These $5,000,000 in addition will make $17,000,000 for maintenance from the 1st of November to the 4th of March, 1921.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I will admit that for the Ohio River and many other waterways of the country adequate funds are available out of appropriations heretofore made to carry on the improvements which are needed, but such is not the case with respect to the Mississippi and the Missouri Rivers.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. What good reason is there for the improvement of the Missouri River if the channel is in one State to-day and in another State to-morrow?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. The Missouri River does not shift its channel as rapidly as the gentleman from Illinois seems to think. In 1900, pursuant to an appropriation made by Congress, the Army engineers improved a 45-mile section of the Missouri River lying between Jefferson City and Osage with the purpose of establishing a 6-foot channel. This was one of the worst sections of the river and was selected as an experiment. Prior to such improvement the river was spread out over a width of 1 to 1½ miles with no fixed or permanent channel. Dikes were constructed narrowing the channel to 1,200 feet. Floods came, throwing the current down this 1,200-foot channel, while the eddying waters between the dikes deposited their silt until the banks of the river, at the end of three years, extended up to the 1,200-foot channel, thus reclaiming thousands of acres of the most alluvial and fertile lands, while the newly made channel over the entire distance was found to be more than 6 feet. After 10 years had elapsed, during which time this channel remained stationary, the Army engineers, after making their soundings, found that the channel over this entire distance ranged from 10 to 30 feet.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. And to-day this section stands practically intact, varying in depth from 11 to 30 feet.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes; and what was done on the Missouri River from Jefferson to Osage can be done over every foot of that river from Kansas City to St. Louis, and a permanent channel thereby established, which will carry millions of tons of commerce each year.

About a year ago I talked with an Army engineer who was stationed at Kansas City and who had charge of the Missouri River and was familiar with its condition. He told me that the river from Kansas City to St. Louis is 400 miles long, that for 350 miles of that distance there is to-day a 6-foot channel at low-water mark, but that for 50 miles of that distance sandbars were distributed, affording a channel at low-water mark of less than 3 feet. Since for purposes of navigation a river is no better than its shallowest point, it is evident that even though there is to-day 350 miles of 6-foot channel between St. Louis and Kansas City, the river can not be used because the Government, which controls the great waterways of the country, has failed to remove the sand bars which obstruct the river over the remaining 50 miles.

In 1910, under the direction of Congress, the Army engineers made an examination as to the practicability and probable cost of improving the Mississippi from Cairo to St. Paul and the Missouri River from Kansas City to its mouth. Their report was favorable to the improvement of both rivers, and Congress adopted the projects proposed by the Army engineers for the improvement of these rivers. It was estimated that a permanent 6-foot channel at low-water mark could be established on the Missouri River between Kansas City and St. Louis for an expenditure of $20,000,000, and Congress undertook to make this improvement by appropriating $2,000,000 per year, the project to be completed in 1920, the current year.

The business men of Kansas City, to show their faith in river navigation and relying upon the good faith of Congress, organized a barge line company with a capital stock, fully paid up, of $1,000,000, and they purchased steel barges and towboats and began operations upon the river, and continued such operations for nine years, until the Government requisitioned their equipment for use in the prosecution of the war.

I am advised by the manager of this barge line company that during six months of every year, when high water afforded a channel, they operated successfully and at a profit, but that during three months of the year their profits were dissipated by delays and expense incurred while dislodging their barges from sand bars. In the meantime, however, while this barge line company operated in good faith, Congress, instead of appropriating $2,000,000 each year, as was intended, has appropriated only $8,000,000 in 10 years, much of which has been wasted, because the Army engineers did not have sufficient funds with which to carry on improvements and to protect the work already done.

Some members of the committee have endeavored to justify their failure to provide in this bill sufficient funds to carry on improvements on the Mississippi and the Missouri Rivers on the ground that cities adjacent thereto have not shown sufficient interest in river navigation by the erection of suitable docks and terminals. Is it any wonder the people along these rivers, when they have so long observed the delay of Congress in making appropriations for river improvements and its failure to carry out its river program when adopted, should hesitate to spend money to build docks and terminals which can not be used until the rivers are made navigable by governmental appropriations? As a matter of fact, is there any more reason for requiring the people who happen to reside in towns and cities along the river to build docks and terminals for barge lines, operated either by the Government or by private capital, than there is for requiring them to build railway stations, and certainly no one would ever urge that the people of a town or city should build a railway station before the railroad was built and before the money for building such a road was even available, and that is what is being expected as to docks and terminals. Furthermore, is it just to expect a city at its own cost to build docks and terminals when the great bulk of the freight passing through such terminals is neither consigned to nor originates in such city? Yet in the face of the fact that the building of terminals by municipalities is unusual and in the face of delays long practiced by Congress, St. Paul and Minneapolis have built adequate river terminals; Kansas City has river terminals sufficient to handle its commerce; Memphis and Helena, Ark., have appropriated large sums of money for the purpose of building terminals; New Orleans has abundant terminal facilities; and St. Louis has recently expended the sum of $800,000 for the erection of modern river terminals with up-to-date loading and unloading equipment, and is about to vote upon a bond issue which provides a million more for this purpose, while the State of Illinois has appropriated $20,000,000 to construct an 8-foot canal from Chicago to the point of navigation of the Illinois River in order to give the commerce of Chicago the benefit of a cheap water rate to the Mississippi Valley; also to the Panama Canal and South American ports, and yet this canal can not be utilized until the Illinois and Mississippi Rivers have been improved and made navigable. What stronger evidence could be desired as to the anxiety of the people of the Mississippi Valley for the establishment of river navigation?

From the Gulf of Mexico to Cairo, Ill., the Mississippi has been improved and now has a permanent channel, at low-water mark, of 9 feet. From Cairo to St. Louis the river has not been improved, and while there is usually an 8-foot channel it is not permanent and stationary, but is constantly shifting, so that barges plying between St. Louis and New Orleans are unable to avoid collision with sand bars, thereby greatly retarding navigation. Thus the Mississippi has been improved and the channel fixed 1,081 miles from the Gulf of Mexico, while a stretch of 120 miles of unimproved river lies between that and a great railroad center with modern river terminals at St. Louis, where the commerce of the central valley could be given an opportunity to benefit by cheap water rates. Even if the condition of the Treasury should impel us to neglect the Missouri and upper Mississippi for another year, how can we afford to delay the completion of the 120 miles between Cairo and St. Louis, when its completion will bring cheap water rates from the Gulf of Mexico to the central Mississippi Valley, thereby enabling us to utilize the 600 miles of river already completed.

We built the Panama Canal at an enormous cost, and the funds therefor were supplied by the people of the whole country. It is of tremendous advantage to the eastern and western coasts, for it shortens the water line between them; but of what advantage is it to the interior ports of this country? Today, if the people in the valley want to get their goods to the Panama Canal, they must first ship them at rail rates to the eastern seaboard, where they are taken by ships, for that is the route over which the commerce now goes. Open the river to cheap transportation north and south, and the commerce of the valley will utilize the canal, and, furthermore, a trade will develop between the Mississippi Valley and the countries of South America which will be of great value to the United States.

Mr. Chairman, the committee further attempts to justify its failure to make more ample provision for the improvement of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers, on the ground that that part of the Mississippi River which has already been improved is not being more extensively used. The limited amount of navigation upon that portion of the Mississippi River which has been improved is due partly to causes which I have already described, but it is chiefly due to a practice, long since established by the railroads and tolerated by the Interstate Commerce Commission, whereby the railroads make rates between river points which amount to less than 50 per cent of rates which they make between points where there is no water competition.

In order to demonstrate this point, I had a representative go to the railroad offices in St. Louis on yesterday and procure information for me as to the rates between certain river points, also between certain points where no river competition exists; and in his report I find that the freight rate on 100 pounds of sugar from New Orleans to St. Louis, a distance of 700 miles, is 44 cents, while the rate on 100 pounds of sugar from New Orleans to Camden, Ark., a distance of 360 miles, and where no water competition exists, is 50 cents, and that the freight rate on 100 pounds of sugar from New Orleans to De Queen, Ark., a distance of 417 miles, and where no water competition exists, is 54 cents. I also find that the freight rate per 100 pounds on corrugated strawboard boxes from St. Louis to New Orleans, a distance of 700 miles, is 44 cents, while the freight rate per 100 pounds upon such boxes from St. Louis to Wiggins, Miss., a distance of 625 miles, and where no water competition exists, is 87 cents. The freight rate per 100 pounds from St. Louis to Springfield, Mo., a distance of 239 miles, and where no water competition exists, is 77½ cents, and the freight rate per 100 pounds from St. Louis to Madison, Wis., a distance of 371 miles, and where no water competition exists, is 65 cents. Thus it will be observed that the freight rates upon railroads between water points is less than 50 per cent of what it is on lines where water competition exists. If the railroads can afford to make such rates for the carrying of freight along the river, then the Interstate Commerce Commission ought to compel them to make similar rates throughout the country. However, after the Government's experience in the operation of railroads during the war, whereby we sustained a loss of $1,300,000,000, I think the public has learned that it is doubtful whether the railroads can afford to carry freight at the rate which they are now charging between inland points, and it is evident that the rates which they are making and have been making between river points is less than 50 per cent of the actual cost of operation, and yet these rates were established years ago, and undoubtedly for the sole and exclusive purpose of driving water competition from the rivers. The Interstate Commerce Commission has tolerated this destructive and expensive practice, and Congress has permitted it to continue by failing to enact legislation prohibiting it; and, incredible as it may seem, the Government of the United States has permitted this practice to continue during its operation of the railroads, thereby greatly augmenting the losses which it has sustained as the result of such operation. One arm of the Government has expended and is expending sums to the total amount of $10,000,000 for barges, towboats, and other equipments for use on the Mississippi and Warrior Rivers, in an effort to revive navigation upon these rivers, while another arm of the Government is operating railroads along these waterways, carrying freight at less than 50 per cent of the cost of operation, in an effort to prevent navigation from developing upon such rivers; and now we propose to further prevent the development of such navigation by delaying the appropriation of funds with which to provide the necessary channels for such barges and towboats. I repeat, if that is economy, then I fail to understand the meaning of the term.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. I want to ask the gentleman this question: If ten times as much money had been appropriated for the improvement of inland waterways as has been appropriated, would water transportation, in his judgment, be greater than it is to-day?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Transportation upon the rivers has been greatly retarded by the failure of Congress to appropriate money to make the necessary improvements. But I doubt if any large amount of river traffic will develop as long as the railroads operating between water points are permitted to practice this destructive and wasteful competition. However, I am pleased to advise the gentleman from Nevada that both the Esch and Cummins bills, which are now in the hands of the conferees, contain ample provisions for abolishing this baneful practice, and when this practice is abolished we shall find an abundance of commerce springing up everywhere along our inland waterways.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. That is exactly the point and the fact that I wanted to bring out.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. As the matter stands to-day, barge lines operating upon the Mississippi River are carrying freight at a rate equal to 80 per cent of the rate charged by railroads paralleling the river, which is less than 40 per cent of the rate charged by railroads for carrying freight between inland points thoughout the country, and Mr. M. J. Sanders, Federal director of the Mississippi and Warrior River Barge Lines, while testifying before the Rivers and Harbors Committee, recently stated that in the light of his experience as director of such barge lines he had no doubt but what when modern equipment is available he would be able to operate such lines at a less rate for freight than he is now charging and still earn a handsome profit for the Government.

Mr. Oscar F. Barrett, of Cincinnati, a practical river man, who owns a large number of boats and barges which he operates on the Mississippi and who in the face of war-time prices and ruinous railroad competition expended $100,000 last year for new equipment, while testifying before the Rivers and Harbors Committee demonstrated his faith in river navigation by stating that if unfair railroad competition could be prevented he could raise $10,000,000 in 60 days' time for investment in river equipment.

I hope you will not construe my attitude as unfriendly to the railroads. They have been hampered by unfriendly legislation and public officials until they could not develop and until their stocks have become the most unattractive investment in the land. Government operation has taught us much about them that we had never known. But their management has done many foolish things, among which was an attempt to destroy a competition which they could not meet except at a loss, and that, too, when they had more freight than they could carry between points where water competition did not exist. I trust, however, that in the future they will profit by their mistakes of the past.

River navigation now only benefits the inhabitants of cities along the waterways, but when joint through rates are established and through bills of lading issued all products carried part way over water between origin and destination will profit by the cheaper rate. For instance, Kansas City is situated in the center of one of the largest wheat-producing sections of the United States. A large portion of that wheat is shipped to flour mills in Kansas City and manufactured into flour, and I am advised that a great portion of it is then shipped to the Pittsburgh manufacturing district and sold, while the bulk of the wheat remaining is shipped to some seaport, where it is loaded upon ocean vessels and carried to foreign ports. • If our rivers were improved and navigation established the flour manufactured by the mills in Kansas City could be loaded upon barges, float down the Missouri to the Mississippi, then down the Mississippi to Cairo, and then towed up the Ohio to Pittsburgh, and the shipper of such flour would enjoy a rate of less than 50 per cent of that which he is now paying to the railroads, and wheat intended for foreign markets belonging to farmers and grain operators throughout Kansas, Nebraska, and western Missouri could pay the inland freight rate over the short rail haul to Kansas City, then load their wheat upon barges and have them towed down the Missouri to the Mississippi, thence down the Mississippi to the Gulf, enjoying a rate from Kansas City to the ocean of less than 50 per cent of what they are now compelled to pay. Would not such a rate be a benefit to every farmer and wheat operator in Kansas, Nebraska, Missouri, Iowa, and Illinois, or any other State so situated as to enable its freight to enjoy the cheaper water rate over a part of its road to destination? The proof is conclusive that the railroads can not compete with barge lines in carrying freight. This difference in the cost of carriage should be recognized by the public and by Congress, and the barge lines should be permitted to carry the freight, where they can carry it cheaper, and the railroads should be paid a higher and a compensatory rate where barge lines are not available. Such a practice would benefit both the railroads and the public.

Not only would river navigation be a blessing to the inland farmers, producers, and manufacturers of the Middle West, but it would release thousands of cars which are now being used to transport wheat, flour, and other products from the Mississippi Valley to the eastern seaboard, so that such cars could then be used to relieve the transportation congestion now pervailing all over the country, and there would still be more freight available for the railroads than they could handle.

The railroads would be infinitely better off, because the public, enjoying the benefits of cheaper transportation of its foreign commerce, could then afford to pay them a remunerative rate upon its domestic commerce and they would no longer have the burden of operating a part of their lines at a heavy loss in an unwise effort to prevent commerce from developing upon the rivers.

As a further illustration of the benefits to be derived from cheap water rates to the people living inland and away from waterways, permit me to state that not long since a towboat arrived in St. Louis from New Orleans carrying 68,000 sacks of sugar. Only 14,000 sacks of this cargo were consigned to St. Louis merchants, while 52,000 sacks were loaded upon freight cars at St. Louis and carried to points inland, thus enabling the inland consumers to benefit by the cheap water haul from New Orleans to St. Louis. And that which was accomplished by this cargo of sugar can be accomplished upon lumber, coffee, rice, and every commodity imported from a foreign country and used or consumed in the Mississippi Valley.

For the purpose of showing the enormous amount of tonnage which can be carried in river navigation even under adverse circumstances, I desire to state that a towboat recently picked up two new steel barges built by the Government, and placing therein thirteen hundred tons of iron ore at St. Paul it proceeded without mishap down the river to St. Louis. So insignificant was this load that it caused the barges to draw only 3 feet of water and probably did not constitute more than one-fifth of the load which such barges were capable of carrying. Yet light as this quantity of iron ore was to a towboat it was sufficient to have loaded 50 freight cars, each having a carrying capacity of 50,000 pounds.

As a further evidence of the extent to which river navigation would relieve the present congestion in transportation, I desire to again call your attention to the testimony of Director Sanders, given when he appeared before the Rivers and Harbors Committee on December the 9th last. Upon that occasion he stated that a towboat had just arrived in St. Louis from New Orleans with 8,700 tons of freight. Considering 50,000 pounds as the average tonnage of a freight car loaded with general merchandise, which is a fair average, this cargo was sufficient to have loaded 348 freight cars. The Government now has in process of construction, and for use upon the Mississippi and Warrior Rivers, six steel twin-screw, 1,800-horsepower towboats and 40 steel barges, each barge having a carrying capacity of 2,000 tons. These towboats are to cost $360,000 each, and the barges are to cost $103,000 each. Mr. DUNN tells us that if the railroads should expend $1,000,000,000 additional each year for three years, with the best and most efficient management obtainable, they could not handle the business of the country.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Do I understand that we are ready to give the railroads $1,000,000,000 approximately to tide them over, but that we stagger at giving a few million dollars to develop the waterways and harbors of this country?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. It is not expected that we shall be required to appropriate out of the Treasury $1,000,000,000 for each of the next three years for the use of the railroads for making improvements in order to enable them to meet the demands of commerce, but if the railroads are to make such improvements the funds therefor will necessarily come from the shippers and passengers who use the trains, and it will have to be paid for at a rate more than 100 per cent higher than a similar service would cost if rendered by boats and barges upon the river.

One of the lessons we have learned as a result of the World War is the vital importance of conserving our national resources. Our supply of timber is being constantly reduced and every effort is being exerted by the railroads to conserve ties. Transportation facilities can be established upon our inland waterways sufficient to meet the growing demands of commerce without the use of a single tie. The importance of conserving iron and steel is constantly increasing. The Government determined during the war that 29,000 tons of steel, costing $6,500,000, was sufficient from which to construct enough barges and towboats to carry annually a million tons of freight between New Orleans and St. Louis, while it was found that to construct rail equipment sufficient to haul an equal amount of freight would require 95,000 tons of steel, costing over $30,000,000. Then, too, it was found that it takes far less coal to convey a given amount of freight by water than it does by rail. In the light of this enormous saving to the Nation in timber and fuel and steel, how can Congress refuse to improve these our great inland waterways?

As I stated before, such modern, up-to-date, twin-screw towboats cost $360,000 each; a modern, up-to-date steel barge, with a capacity of 2,000 tons, costs $103,000. Thus $1,000,000,000 would purchase 1,000 towboats and 5,000 barges and leave $125,000,000—enough to complete the Mississippi River to St. Paul, the Missouri to Kansas City, the Illinois to its junction with the Chicago Canal, and have millions left. Five thousand steel barges of 2,000 tons each would have a carrying capacity equal to 400,000 railroad cars. If one towboat can go from New Orleans to St. Louis carrying freight sufficient in quantity to load 348 railroad cars, then 1,000 towboats equipped with adequate barges can each carry a similar cargo; and I venture the assertion, without fear of successful contradiction, that $1,000,000,000 will complete the Mississippi River to St. Paul, the Missouri River to Kansas City, and the Illinois River to the Chicago Canal, pay for the construction of enough barges and towboats to carry the outgoing and incoming commerce of the Mississippi Valley, and pay for the erection of a modern, up-to-date terminal in every city where freight is to be loaded. And what is more, it will relieve the congestion in transportation, make it possible for commerce to expand and the country to develop, and will result in the accumulation of incomes from which a depleted Treasury can be replenished and a staggering war debt reduced. In the face of the facts which I have presented and the conditions which I have described are we willing to depend alone upon the railroads for transportation, and that, too, when we are told upon good authority that an expenditure of $1,000,000,000 per year for three years will not equip them to handle the commerce of the country? This transportation question must be solved. The Nation can not stand idly by and see its commerce become stagnant and decay for want of the one essential upon which its existence depends.

I do not believe in Government ownership of railroads. I believe that such utilities, under proper regulation, should be left to private enterprise. But the country must have facilities for transportation. The railroads are admittedly unable to meet the demands made upon them, and the prospect for their future is not bright. If the railroads fail to meet the demands of commerce and other relief is not granted, then Government ownership is inevitable. Is it wise to utter a wail for economy and fold our arms in despair because funds are not available? Would it not be more economical to issue bonds or borrow funds and proceed at once to open our rivers to navigation?

Is such a policy of so-called economy consistent with our past? We wasted hundreds of millions of dollars by the methods used in the preparation and conduct of the war. Not long ago we gave a hundred million dollars to feed the peoples of Europe, and now it is proposed that we vote $150,000,000 more. We expended twenty-five billions establishing democracies beyond the seas, and now we gasp at the thought of investing a few millions at home in opening our rivers to navigation and commerce.

River improvements are inevitable. To delay their progress is waste. Arguments in their favor are unanswerable. The day will come, and soon, when sound economy and good judgment will prevail. The necessary legislation will be enacted, appropriations will be made, and the work will be done. Then the waters now rolling uselessly through our valleys will bear their burdens and contribute their share to the nation's wealth. Why delay a task of such grave importance? Why not do it now?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Mr. Chairman, this committee should be highly commended for strength of character to reduce the ever-increasing amounts carried in the rivers and harbors bill. The time has arrived for reason in all things, and this committee has the courage to apply the remedy—economy—where it belongs. This will prove disappointing to those accustomed to receiving governmental aid under the guise of good business, but what they lose in subsidy will be gained for self-reliance. Rivers and harbors always carried too much money, benefiting contiguous lands worth billions, without placing a single boat on the river. The rivers provided for are paralleled with railroads which make a discriminatory rate against interior points favorable to points where land and water meet; thus, instead of fostering water traffic by a square deal, interior points upon rails are charged unfair rates favoring water points, using dishonest practices to unjustly assault and destroy water transportation. It now comes with poor grace to ask interior points to vote money for water traffic while you permit rail rates to destroy shipping. The money to control floods seems just and reasonable, but unjust and unequal rail rates which destroy water competition are dishonest and clearly encourage special privilege. Communities and chambers of commerce should guarantee that pensions intended to stimulate transportation by water should be not sandbagged by a loose interpretation of section 4, act of 1887. River localities while gaining low freight rates have permitted natural water traffic to be obliterated. Railroads under the management of shrewd men drawing salaries of $100,000 per year became bankrupt, even while getting Government subsidies of alternate sections 20 miles upon each side of their right of way. It is most difficult to withdraw special privilege, once established, and hard to convince Congress that rails require new management. The stock in those magnificent properties should be enhancing in value, and will when properly managed.

Mr. WHALEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the committee do now rise. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a memorial sent to me by the gentlemen signing it. They make a statement of certain proceedings had on a hearing of charges against one of the Metropolitan police force and state certain matters which require at least publicity if the matters stated be true. I ask that the statement be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF THE CASE OF ROBERT T. HUNTINGTON IN THE POLICE COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA AND BEFORE THE TRIAL BOARD OF THE METROPOLITAN POLICE DEPARTMENT.

Pursuant to a conference with Hon. LAWRENCE Y. SHERMAN, of Illinois, chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, held on the morning of January 20, 1920, in regard to the failure of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, the Metropolitan Police Department, the trial board of said department, and the corporation counsel's office of the District of Columbia to properly function in regard to the grave injustice perpetrated by them upon Robert T. Huntington, we submit the following statement:

Richard J. Taggart, Esq., and William L. Taggart, Esq., of the bar of the District of Columbia, represent the heirs of the late Hon. Hugh T. Taggart and Louis C. Ritchie, coowners of premises 3516-3534 M Street NW., this city, in matters pertaining to the proper protection and development of said properties.

The owners, being taxpayers, naturally feel entitled to the protection afforded by the Metropolitan Police Department of the District of Columbia, at least to the extent of preventing malicious destruction of their property by disorderly subjects, of protecting the personal liberty of their tenants, and protecting said tenants from aggression and insult from the members of that department.

The owners do not feel that they are receiving the protection to which they are entitled, for the following reasons:

On the morning of Tuesday, October 28, 1919, a few minutes before 6 o'clock of that date, Mrs. Florence Huntington, wife of Robert T. Huntington, tenant of 3526 M Street NW., was drawn to the front of their home by the sound of crashing glass. There she learned that two disorderly men had engaged in a brawl in front of her husband's store window and, while so engaged, broken through it.

No police officer was in sight. After the elapse of 15 or 20 minutes, however, Private Stevens emerged from a lunch room immediately adjoining and, instead of arresting the offenders, engaged in a verbal conflict with Mrs. Huntington. She was anxious that something be done in regard to the matter and asked the officer why he had been so long in appearing. His reply was that he did not hear the crash. Mrs. Huntington stated she had heard it all the way upstairs, whereupon the private brazenly called her a "liar."

A few minutes later Mr. Huntington, who had been away from the store on a short business errand, returned and endeavored to learn what the trouble was. Private Stevens then, in response to an inquiry from Mr. Huntington, brutally remarked, "Don't give me any of your damn lip or I will arrest you," which he did, allowing the real offenders to go unmolested, and they still remain unmolested.

William L. Taggart, Esq., represented Mr. Huntington in the matter of the charge preferred against him. On the morning of October 31, 1919, the day set for the trial, all of the parties assembled in the office of Assistant Corporation Counsel Hart for a hearing. Mr. Hart, surmising the serious nature of the officer's conduct from the array of witnesses before him, remarked, "There is no doubt that this case will be dismissed, but if it is, you people will go to the police department and prefer charges against the officer, which will create a 'stigma' on the police department," and that he would nolle prosse the case if Mr. Huntington would let it drop. Mr. and Mrs. Huntington and their attorney objected to any such arrangement. It appears that the assistant corporation counsel, Mr. Hart, was more "solicitous" of protecting the good name of the police department than in seeing that justice was done between the parties. He at one time was secretary to Raymond W. Pullman, major and superintendent of the Metropolitan Police Department.

On account of pressing business matters Richard J. Taggart was unable to be present at the hearing in the police court. Later in the day, however, he and his brother, William L. Taggart, and Mr. Robert T. Huntington went to the office of Maj. Pullman and laid the facts in the case before him.

After hearing a statement of the facts from them he referred them to one of his assistants, to whom a statement covering the situation was dictated. Since then a request for copy of said statement has been ignored.

The police department made an investigation of the case and then required Mr. and Mrs. Huntington to file affidavits covering the facts. This they did, with the result that charges were formulated against Pvt. Stevens, and on the morning of December 20, 1919, he appeared before the trial board for a hearing. Eight or 10 witnesses for the prosecution appeared, but only three were allowed to be heard.

The first witness called stated what he had himself heard and seen, which in itself was enough to convict the officer. Mrs. Huntington then testified, and was succeeded on the stand by her husband. Their testimony conclusively showed that the officer had used insulting language to a lady and that he had been under the influence of liquor. At the conclusion of Mr. Huntington's testimony evidence as to what had happened in the police court on the morning of Friday, December 31, 1919, was erroneously admitted. It was intimated by counsel for the private that an agreement not to have charges preferred to the trial board had been entered into, which was entirely immaterial.

The prosecution was halted and Mr. Hart was called to testify on behalf of the defense. He stated that at the hearing in his office all the parties had seemed "solicitous" that no further action should be taken in regard to the case. Upon this ex parte statement of a matter entirely irrelevant and immaterial, and without giving complainants opportunity of refuting their testimony, the chairman of the board arbitrarily terminated the hearing by dismissing the charges. The right of cross-examination was absolutely denied.

Neither Mr. nor Mrs. Huntington were allowed to be represented by attorney, and the chairman of the board, Assistant Corporation Counsel Williams, and his two assistants shamefully neglected and failed dismally in their duty to see that complainants' case was fairly presented.

An appeal was promptly filed with the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, which is still pending, unacted on.

Communications have been addressed to the major and superintendent of police, to the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and to the chairman of the trial board requesting copy of the testimony taken before the trial board and asking early action on the appeal.

Said communications to the major and superintendent and to the commissioners have been referred to the chairman of the trial board, who studiously ignores counsel for the complainants in regard to the matter. He did not even show them the courtesy of acknowledging their communication to him, and seems to have made up his mind to let the matter lie before him indefinitely.

It would appear from the foregoing that the board of commissioners, the police department, the trial board of said department, and the corporation counsel's office had knowledge of the facts herein set forth and have combined, and it is their whole end, aim, and object to protect the good name of the Metropolitan Police Department irrespective of their duty to protect the personal liberty and private property of the public.

Pvt. Stevens is still on duty in the vicinity of these properties, and the owners are fearful of other damage to them and violation of the rights of their tenants. They certainly will soon be without either property or tenants if such men are intrusted with the protection of it and them.

It would appear that drastic action is required to prevent the happening of such occurrences in the future.

RICHARD J. TAGGART.
WILLIAM L. TAGGART.

Mr. HARDING. I send to the desk for printing in the RECORD a short memorial in behalf of the surviving veterans of the Civil War.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

A MEMORIAL AND PETITION.

Representing, as I believe, the sentiment and desire of my comrades of the Civil War, I respectfully memorialize and pray your honorable bodies soon to favor and pass the pending bill giving us an increase of pension.

When Daniel Webster, at the laying of the corner stone of Bunker Hill Monument, addressed the remnant of the Continental Army as "venerable men who have come down to us from a former generation" it was just 50 years then from the date of the Declaration of Independence. It is now 54 years since the firing on Sumter, and but a small and very aged remnant of the soldiers of that day survive now. So we respectfully submit that if our bill be delayed it soon will be too late to benefit us who "are about to die."

Most respectfully,

JAMES MCCORMICK DALZELL,
Private, Company H, One hundred and Sixteenth Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

Mr. NELSON presented a petition of Columbia Typographical Union, No. 101, of Washington, D. C., praying for the enactment of legislation making February 12 of each year a legal holiday, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Minnesota remonstrating against the adoption of the antistrike provision in the pending railroad legislation, which was ordered to lie on the table.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD a letter from Hamilton Holt, of the Independent, to the New York World, in which he recites and recapitulates a number of tests, straw votes, on the subject of the treaty of peace taken by various agencies all over the country. He calls particular attention to the fact that in the great vote by 410 colleges, wherein 158,078 votes were cast, the enemies of the league polled only one-tenth of the total vote and the supporters of the Lodge reservations only one-fifth of the total vote. He cites also a postal-card test taken of returned soldiers showing an overwhelming sentiment for the ratification of the treaty with the League of Nations. He cites also the American Federation of Labor, the Church Peace Union, and other tests, and finally he cites a recent vote taken by 14 daily newspapers which united their records and which show 48 per cent for unqualified ratification, 35 per cent for a compromise of ratification, 10 per cent for the Lodge reservations, and 7 per cent for no league.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I merely want to recall to my friend the Senator from Nebraska the statement by the editor of the World preceding the election in Kentucky that that election would constitute the first actual test of sentiment on the league. It may be added that not one of the signers of the treaty in behalf of France is included in the new cabinet chosen to succeed that of Monsieur Clemenceau.

There being no objection, the statement submitted by Mr. HITCHCOCK was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE PEOPLE FOR THE TREATY.

To the Editor of the World:

Last week's overwhelming vote of the faculties and students of the American colleges and universities in favor of ratifying the covenant without reservations, or only with such reservations as will honorably compromise the differences between the factions in the Senate favoring some kind of a league of nations, must have given Senator LODGE and his drastic reservationists and Senator BORAH and his battalion of death a severe jolt.

Of the 158,078 votes taken in 410 institutions, 61,494 favored a compromise to permit immediate ratification, 48,232 favored the treaty without change, 27,970 expressed themselves in accord with the Lodge program, 13,943 favored killing the treaty and the league, and 6,449 would negotiate a new treaty with Germany. In other words, less than one-tenth of the vote favored BORAH and less than one-fifth favored LODGE. President Wilson's uncompromising stand evoked more support than the Lodge and Borah proposals combined. In fine, nine-tenths of the voters are in favor of ratification in some form and seven-tenths are for a league more virile than the Foreign Relations Committee would have it.

This vote, in which the mature judgment of the faculties corresponds with the idealism of the students, has been confirmed by every other test so far taken in the country. The result of a postal-card poll of returned soldiers and sailors from southern Massachusetts made by Mr. Frank L. Andrews of Fall River showed that 554 voted for the league unamended, 5 for reservations, and 12 were opposed.

The American Federation of Labor at its annual meeting in July voted 29,000 in favor of the covenant and 400 against it. At a meeting of the national and State officers at Washington on December 13, 1919, the vote was 240 to 3 in favor of ratification, two of the three dissenters being unredeemed Irishmen.

The Church Peace Union took a Nation-wide poll of the ministers of the country, Protestant, Catholic, and Jewish. The vote was 17,309 in favor of and 816 against—most of those in opposition being Irish Catholics.

Fourteen daily newspapers from 10 States have just taken a very significant poll of their readers. The total vote was 48 per cent for no reservations, 35 per cent for a compromise, 10 per cent for the Lodge reservations, 7 per cent for no league. Most of the papers were in Republican congressional districts. The poll of the Portland Oregonian, which is not included in these percentages, was 11,096 for unamended ratification, 665 for compromise, 112 for the Lodge reservations, and 228 for no treaty.

I have addressed 30 meetings in 10 States in the last three months on the league of nations—North, South, East, and West. Before I presented my case I invariably called for a show of hands from the audience. With one exception—on the New York east side—every assemblage voted about the same, not only those who came knowing they were to hear an address in favor of the league but those ready-made audiences such as composed the City Club of Cleveland, the Teachers' Association of Minnesota, and the Southern Commercial Congress, which came for the occasion and not for the speaker. I found that about 60 per cent were in favor of the treaty as presented by the President, 30 per cent were for mild reservations, and the remaining 10 per cent were scattered between the drastic reservationists and bitter-enders.

If all these straw votes are not sufficiently conclusive, the last doubt of where the country stands on the covenant must have been removed when the official representatives of 26 national organizations waited on Senator LODGE and Senator HITCHCOCK last week and urged them, in behalf of the majority and minority factions which they represent in the Senate, to get together, to compromise their differences, and to ratify the treaty without delay. When practically all the official organizations of the land, representing, among other classes, the farmers, the workers, the churches, the schools and colleges, the women, unite on a program of this kind, it is the American people that is speaking.

From the above expressions of American sentiment it is evident that the present alignment of the country on the League of Nations differs radically from that of the Senate. In other words, the Senate does not represent the American people on this issue.

The Senators, therefore, have two imperative duties to perform if they would satisfy the people whose servants they are.

First. They must compromise their differences so that 64 of the 80 Senators favoring some kind of a league of nations will ratify the treaty.

Second. They must agree upon such a compromise as will permit the President to transmit it to our allies for their acceptance, rather than to project the issue into the next presidential election.

If the Senate in ratifying the treaty so emasculates it as to force the President to the latter course, there can be little doubt as to what the people will do at the next election both to the party and the individual Senators who are responsible for the delay.

HAMILTON HOLT.

NEW YORK, January 19.

LEAGUE OF PEACE.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a short editorial from the Philadelphia Ledger of Sunday, January 4, entitled "Roosevelt for a league of peace."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ROOSEVELT FOR A LEAGUE OF PEACE.

"A casual reader of Mr. Lawrence Abbott's 'Impressions of Theodore Roosevelt' is liable to miss one of the most impressive and important things in the book, buried, as it is, in the middle of an extract from the comparatively little-known address which Roosevelt delivered before the Nobel prize committee at Christiana in May, 1910.

"No one will have the temerity to question Theodore Roosevelt's patriotism or his 'nationalism.' It will scarcely be claimed that any of his utterances need 'Americanization.'

"This Christiana address was one of the more studied and carefully prepared addresses of his European tour, being delivered on an official occasion and before an audience of several thousand people, on the subject of 'International peace.' After expressing the hope that an 'international supreme court' of the world might be established and that armaments might be limited by international agreement, he added that until 'some form of international police power, competent and willing to prevent violence as between nations,' was established, 'each nation must keep well prepared to defend itself.' In other words, he recognized and admitted the fact that the choice for every government in the world was between becoming a party to a 'form of international police power' or laying upon its people the burden of maintaining an armament sufficient to defend itself from any foe or combination of foes. Just what the thought in his mind was, just what he meant by 'an international police power competent and willing to prevent violence as between nations,' he did not leave to guess or inference, however. He made it plain beyond the possibility of doubt or misunderstanding. He included this immensely significant sentence:

"It would be a master stroke if those great powers honestly bent on peace should form a league of peace, not only to keep the peace among themselves but to prevent, by force if necessary, its being broken by others.

"If Theodore Roosevelt had been representing the United States at Versailles in 1918, can there be any doubt that he would have urged that 'master stroke'? Can there be doubt that, if the task had been assigned to him, he would have written article 10 of the league covenant either as it is written or in language even stronger and more far-reaching? And will any friend or admirer of Theodore Roosevelt, any American who has one shred of respect for his memory, dare claim that he would have feared or shirked the responsibility of the assumption by the United States of its obligations under such a world league?"

CESSION OF THRACE TO GREECE.

Mr. LODGE. I report favorably from the Committee on Foreign Relations, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, Senate resolution 216, and I call the attention of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to it. I would be glad if it could have present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The READING CLERK. It is proposed to strike out the preamble and all after the word "Resolved" and to insert:

That it is the sense of the Senate that those parts of Thrace which have been surrendered by Bulgaria and Turkey to the principal allied and associated powers and which, according to the showing made by Greece, are ethnologically and historically Greek and strategically important to Greece, should be awarded by the peace conference to Greece and become incorporated in the Kingdom of Greece, Greece being charged with the duty of granting to Bulgaria arrangements for the accommodation of Bulgarian commerce at an Aegean port of a similar character to the accommodations granted Serbia at Saloniki.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I regret that the committee modified in such a marked degree the resolutions heretofore offered by me dealing with the question of Thrace. This resolution, as I understand, which is based upon the two resolutions which I offered which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, is not as broad and comprehensive or definite as I would like. My resolutions clearly indicated the portion of Thrace which should become a part of the Kingdom of Greece. The last resolution which I offered called for an expression of the Senate approving a policy by the peace conference which would give to Greece all of Thrace except that part occupied by Constantinople. I am afraid this resolution will be misinterpreted and will lead to some misunderstandings. I think, however, it is the intention of the Foreign Relations Committee to express the view that substantially all of Thrace should be awarded by the peace conference to Greece.

There are some parts of Thrace in which the Turks predominate. This, however, resulted from the cruel treatment of the Greeks and the attempt made by the Turkish Government to destroy Grecian domination of those parts of Thrace to which I have just referred. However, ethnographically and geographically, and certainly strategically, substantially all of Thrace should go to Greece; and, interpreting the resolution as so declaring, I shall be glad to support it. I wish it had been clearer in language, but am glad to have this expression from the Foreign Relations Committee and will be glad to have the Senate pass the resolution. At a later day I shall seek an opportunity to submit a few observations concerning the claims of Greece, not only to Thrace but to some parts of Asia Minor.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the resolution comes from the committee of which I am a member, but I was unable to be present at the meeting this morning. It is not my intention to oppose it. I will simply say that in my opinion, and especially in view of the Senate's vote on the treaty, it is not our business to assume to advise.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

SHIPPING BOARD CLAIMS.

Mr. FERNALD. I report back favorably from the Committee on Commerce, with amendments, the bill (S. 3451) authorizing the United States Shipping Board to adjust the equitable claims of wooden-ship builders arising out of the prosecution of the war and I request its immediate consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the bill may be read as proposed to be amended by the committee and as it will be presented to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read as requested.

The Assistant Secretary read the bill as proposed to be amended by the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I want to reserve the right to object to immediate consideration. I am not, however, opposed to the Senator from Maine reporting the bill.

Mr. FERNALD. Let it go to the calendar, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

COMMISSION RELATIVE TO FORMER SOLDIERS, SAILORS, AND MARINES.

Mr. ROBINSON. I introduce a joint resolution and I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 145) creating a joint commission of Congress to investigate respecting the health, employment, and the advisability of legislation to promote the welfare of former soldiers, sailors, and marines in the service of the United States during the war with Germany was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 145) creating a joint commission of Congress to investigate respecting the health, compensation, and employment, and the advisability of legislation to promote the welfare of former soldiers, sailors, and marines in the service of the United States during the war with Germany.

Resolved, etc., That a joint commission of Congress, which shall be composed of three Members of the Senate, to be appointed by the Vice President, and three Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker, is hereby created for the purpose of investigating conditions respecting the health, compensation, and employment, and respecting the advisability of legislation to promote the welfare of former soldiers, sailors, and marines in the service of the United States during the war with the Imperial German Government.

Said commission shall be empowered to hold hearings in Washington and elsewhere in the United States and to issue subpœnas to compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents.

The commission shall report its findings and recommendations to the Congress within 60 days after the passage of this joint resolution.

STANDARD OF CITIZENSHIP.

Mr. PHELAN. I introduce a joint resolution and ask that it may be read.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 144) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following amendment is hereby proposed to the several States as an amendment to the first section of Amendment XIV of the Constitution, which shall become valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States:

"AMENDMENT XIV.

"SECTION 1. All persons born in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof whose parents are white persons, Africans, American Indians, or their descendants, and all persons naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

"The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article."

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I simply desire to state in moving a reference of the joint resolution to the Judiciary Committee that at this time it seems appropriate and timely for the reason that the Congress is engaged in the work of Americanization. This amendment on its face may seem extraordinary to many Senators, because from the beginning of the Republic children born upon the soil are ipso facto citizens. We have acquired the Hawaiian Islands, which are now known as the Territory of Hawaii, an integral part of the United States, and there this condition exists: In less than 14 years the native-born Japanese population will control the Territorial legislature and all the elective offices. Therefore we will find the Territory of Hawaii under alien control because these people are not assimilable, owe allegiance to their Mikado, and who, after and before the regular school hours, are now studying the Japanese language, traditions, and loyalty to the home Government.

They seem to be unassimilable, un-American, and often anti-American, and hence those born upon our soil under this amendment, if it should prevail, would not be in power to control the Territorial government of Hawaii.

At the present birth rate it is estimated that in 90 years there will be more Japanese in California than Americans.

Under the administration of Gov. Johnson, in 1913, a land law was passed by which it was provided that persons ineligible to citizenship in California might not acquire agricultural lands. That law from which so much was expected is to-day absolutely a dead letter, because those forbidden persons are putting the agricultural lands which they buy in the names of their native children, who are citizens and enjoy all of the privileges, rights, and immunities of American citizens.

Hence there is a necessity for changing our fundamental laws so that only the children of white persons, those of African descent and of American Indians and such others as the Congress may naturalize, shall enjoy the priceless boon of American citizenship. We must not allow that boon to be used for the destruction of a State, either California, Oregon, or Washington, or the Territory of Hawaii. I trust that the Judiciary Committee, to which I ask its reference, will favorably consider it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ADMIRAL WILLIAM S. SIMS.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 287) was read, as follows:

Whereas at the hearing being conducted by a subcommittee of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate, on January 17, 1920, Admiral William S. Sims being under examination, he offered and there was received in evidence and thus became public a copy of a letter theretofore addressed by him to the Secretary of the Navy, in which, among other things, the writer said:

"6. In the latter part of March, 1917, in response to a request from the American ambassador in London, expressing the desire of the British Government that a naval officer of high rank be sent to secure the closer cooperation which our Navy Department had suggested, I was ordered abroad on barely 48 hours' notice.

"7. Brief orders were delivered to me verbally in Washington. No formal instructions or statement of the Navy Department's plans or policy were received at that time, though I received the following explicit admonition: 'Don't let the British pull the wool over your eyes. It is none of our business pulling their chestnuts out of the fire. We would as soon fight the British as the Germans'"; and

Whereas the said Secretary of the Navy has, through the public press, explicitly denied having given to Admiral Sims the alleged admonition, to wit: "Don't let the British pull the wool over your eyes. It is none of our business pulling their chestnuts out of the fire. We would as soon fight the British as the Germans"; and

Whereas it is apparent that if such an admonition was given to the said Admiral Sims, at the time and under the circumstances detailed, it was and must have been understood by him to have been highly confidential: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That it is hereby declared to be the sense of the Senate that the disclosure of the alleged admonition by Admiral Sims, constituting, if given, a part of the secret instructions of an officer of the United States Navy on the eve of his departure on a mission of the highest importance and most extreme delicacy, merits universal and unqualified reprobation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I anticipated that in all probability the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs would present a resolution of this character for the consideration of the Senate. As he has not done so, I have assumed to present it myself.

I do not desire to say anything on the resolution further than to remark that whether the admonition was given or was not given to Admiral Sims, the disclosure of it under almost any conceivable circumstances must have the reprehension of every American citizen. If a lawyer should disclose under almost any circumstances the confidential communications made to him by his client he would have the contempt of every member of his profession, if he would not actually be disbarred from practicing.

I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. McCORMICK and Mr. LODGE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. McCORMICK. Without assuming to express a judgment on the resolution of the Senator, and considering that the matter is under review by a subcommittee of the Naval Affairs Committee, I must ask that the resolution go over under the rule.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, of course I take this to be an objection to the present consideration of the resolution; but I merely desire to say that I do not understand that the subcommittee of the Senate is charged with any duty whatever with respect to this matter. The subcommittee of the Senate is charged to inquire into the criticism made by the admiral upon the direction of the naval operations by the Navy Department during the war. I do not desire to precipitate any question whatever here as to whether Admiral Sims is right or is not right in his criticism of the conduct of the operations. That is neither here nor there. I submit, however, that it is impossible to say anything or to find out anything that is in extenuation or justification of the disclosure by this officer of a confidential communication made to him under these circumstances, and I submit that the matter is not to be a matter of consideration by the committee at all under the powers given to it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois made the objection in the usual form by asking that the resolution go over. If the Senator from Montana has any doubt about its being an objection, I object.

Mr. President, I do not wish, on the reading from the desk of a resolution of that character, to condemn unheard and unconsidered one of the highest officers of the Navy of the United States for a remark that he made in testimony before a Senate committee.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask a question of one of the members of the subcommittee?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule.

Mr. BORAH. I want to ask a question before it goes over. Was this letter called out by the subcommittee?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I will answer that question, if the Senator has no objection. The letter was called out at my request.

Mr. BORAH. Admiral Sims did not volunteer that information?

Mr. HALE. Admiral Sims did not volunteer the information.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I have the record before me, and I shall be very glad to give the Senate accurate information concerning the circumstances under which the letter came before the subcommittee. I shall ask leave to do so, if the Senator will yield for that purpose.

Mr. BORAH. I asked one of the subcommittee. I did not know the record was here.

Mr. HALE. The circumstances, Mr. President, were as follows: After Admiral Sims had been going on for some time with his testimony, I asked him whether he had any further correspondence with the Secretary of the Navy touching on the question of awards in the Navy, or on any matter that would affect the morale of the service. I have forgotten the exact wording of his reply; but it was in response to this request that he produced the letter, and I think he did so very properly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the statement made by the chairman of the subcommittee is quite accurate as far as it goes. The facts about the matter, as disclosed by the record, which I have before me, are these:

The admiral was being cross-examined by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and in the course of the cross-examination of the admiral by that Senator the chairman of the committee interposed and asked about a letter. I read as follows:

Senator PITTMAN. In your particular recommendations, by reference to the record, you will find that he acted exactly as the board did in two-thirds of the cases; in some of the cases he reduced the recommendation, and in others he agreed with you.

Admiral SIMS. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Admiral Sims, I think in connection with this matter, if you have had any further correspondence with the Secretary of the Navy about the question of awards and their effect on the morale of the service, it would be well for you to give that correspondence to us at the present time.

Admiral SIMS. It does not bear particularly upon the question of the awards, but it does bear upon the question of the morale of the service.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, I think it is decidedly germane to the issue.

Admiral SIMS. As I said before, the action of the board in the awards is only the last straw in this whole business.

Senator PITTMAN. May I finish this line of examination with regard to this particular subject?

The CHAIRMAN. If the admiral has expressed himself in regard to this matter in any letter that will throw light upon the subject, we should have it.

Senator McCORMICK. My sentiment is that we should give the admiral an opportunity to furnish us these letters before we get too far away from the subject to which they refer.

Senator PITTMAN. It seems to me the admiral has had plenty of opportunity to put anything in this record he desired to insert. I am not making any objection to it, but I have started an inquiry right now with regard to the difference of opinion.

Admiral SIMS. I do not think we can get any further along—

And so on, and so on; and so the cross-examination of the Senator from Nevada proceeds for some length, occupying a number of pages, when the chairman again interposes, and says:

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Senator PITTMAN, with your permission, we will go ahead with the question I put to the admiral, if the admiral cares to proceed.

Admiral SIMS. As I said in the little preliminary statement that I made yesterday, this business of the award of medals fell on the service in a very critical condition of morale, which goes back a long ways, and has quite a good deal to do with the way in which the war was managed from a naval point of view; and it is this question of morale, as well as the question of awards, that is being investigated. It seems to me that it is quite proper that anything that bears on the morale should be taken into consideration.

This is a letter that I have written to the Secretary of the Navy under date of the 7th of January. As I said in my preliminary statement, it is the duty of an officer who has been in a responsible position of command during a considerable war, by the regulations of the Navy Department, to state any criticisms that he may have which, in his judgment, will be useful in avoiding mistakes in future wars; and it is the mistakes we want to avoid, and not camouflage in any respect. The following is this letter:

Mr. HALE. I thank the Senator for practically bearing out what I said. My statement, of course, was made simply on my recollection of what I had said. The admiral did produce the letter, and produced it because I insisted that he should. I am entirely willing to take all responsibility for the publishing of the letter.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I had supposed that this letter came out just as the record shows it did come out—that is, at the request of the subcommittee. I do not suppose the subcommittee knew what was in the letter when they asked for it, but I doubt if the admiral would have any right to refuse to give it up if the subcommittee asked for it. I should want to examine that question before I condemned the admiral.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Let me say before I sit down——

Mr. TRAMMELL. As a member of the committee, I wish to make a brief statement.

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment. Before I sit down I think we are making a mountain out of a molehill as to what Secretary Daniels is supposed to have said. When he advised the admiral not to let the English pull the wool over his eyes, he disclosed a remarkable knowledge of English history and of the great genius of the English people. It is no reflection upon the English people to say they are most vigilant and effective in looking after their interest. It is no serious matter for an American to give instruction to look carefully after our interests. It was a colloquial way of saying guard American interests; that is what you are there for.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to interrupt, the admiral does not charge the Secretary with having given him that instruction, does he?

Mr. HALE. He does not.

Mr. BORAH. Well, whoever he was, he was not guilty of a crime. What was the Senator going to say?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I just desire to state that the admiral was not imposed upon in this matter at all. He had the letter with him, and brought the letter to the committee meeting with him, and nothing had been said in the open session of the committee prior to that time in regard to this letter. It seems, however, that the chairman did know that he had such a letter with him, and the chairman permitted him to read the entire letter, and after the entire letter had been read the chairman discovered that it was without the scope of the authority of the committee to inquire into the matters covered by the letter. He did not even care to have any inquiry made in regard to the letter at that time, but thought the committee should adjourn immediately and take up the matter with the main committee.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the chairman did know that there was such a letter, because it had been spoken about in the public press several days before the hearing. The chairman, however, had not seen the letter and was not aware in any way of its contents.

Mr. BORAH. I do not suppose that Admiral Sims would have any right to object to giving up the letter if he was asked for it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It does not appear that he produced the letter by an order of the committee. He had the copy conveniently at hand.

Mr. BORAH. I suppose he did have it conveniently at hand, because he was under examination with regard to all these matters. But I do not find anything to censure either in Mr. Daniels or the admiral. They were dealing with a situation, and when you analyze Mr. Daniels's statement, if he did make it, there is nothing to which anyone can reasonably object. It was a very proper admonition to be given to the admiral. Simply because we were an associate in the war is no reason we should not be vigilant to protect our interests.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I trust the Senator will recognize that the resolution does not take issue at all with the wisdom or unwisdom of giving the admonition. The question is, Should Admiral Sims have disclosed his secret instructions?

Mr. BORAH. If he had done so voluntarily, I would stand with the Senator; but he was before a committee which was going into the investigation of a very serious matter, and I can see very well how the committee could call it out in perfect good faith, and having so called for it I do not know how the admiral would have any right to refuse to give it up. But I do not care to discuss that at this particular time. That is a matter about which I might change my opinion according to the circumstances as they hereafter develop.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not think this is the time to discuss the merits or the demerits of the unfortunate controversy which Admiral Sims has precipitated and now in charge of the Committee on Naval Affairs. I regret that it has arisen somewhat prematurely; but in view of the comments made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] I want to express my dissent to them. I do not know who gave the instruction or the warning to the admiral to beware of the British, or words to that effect. He has not disclosed its author. The Senator from Idaho says that neither he nor the Secretary is to blame for anything then said or any warning given.

As far as the public have any information, however, it would seem to me that the admiral has grossly violated somebody's confidence in giving to the world an incident which either proceeded from the highest official sources or was made to him by way of friendly and confidential warning.

I hope that the disclosures which the investigation will lead to may disabuse my mind of that opinion, because I have little regard for any man, I do not care whether he is an admiral or a footpad, who will violate a confidence. That defense can neither be condoned nor explained.

It may be that the admonition was a part of his official instructions, and I hope the subcommittee will insist, before the admiral leaves the stand—and he seems to belong to that class of people who need to be given all the rope they want when they hang themselves—that he shall disclose the author of that statement, not because of its abstract importance, although in view of the past pro-British record of the admiral I would regard it as a very necessary precaution; but he ought to be made to give the author and the circumstances under which the warning was given. Now that he has opened the door, everything in the apartment should be disclosed to the public. When that is done I shall probably have something to say regarding an incident.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana, in advocating his resolution calling on the Senate to condemn the revelation of confidential communications from the Navy Department to Admiral Sims, said his justification for introducing the resolution was the fact that the subcommittee would not take cognizance of it under the instructions given it by the Committee on Naval Affairs. I would like to ask the chairman of the subcommittee whether he would think it competent for his subcommittee to pass upon the propriety of the act of Admiral Sims in disclosing this confidential information?

Mr. HALE. I do not think it is especially material, Mr. President. I think, as the Senator from Idaho said, that you are making a mountain out of a molehill. If the Navy Department gave confidential instructions to officers whom it sent abroad within a week or two of the time when we declared war on Germany, telling them that they must not allow the British to pull the wool over their eyes and that we would as soon fight the British as the Germans, I think it is high time that such instructions were called to the attention of the country.

Mr. PHELAN. Then the subcommittee thinks it is its only duty to consider the conduct of the Navy Department and not of the officers of the Navy?

Mr. HALE. We are going to consider the charges in the letter of Admiral Sims, and that will probably lead, I should think, to a general investigation or review of the conduct of the war in connection with naval matters.

Mr. PHELAN. But the question has been raised here in the resolution that it was an act of extreme impropriety on the part of an officer of the Navy in revealing at this time confidential communications. I want to know, because that will govern my course in either approving or disapproving the resolution, whether the subcommittee is going to take cognizance of it with a view of reprimanding Admiral Sims if the proof warrants it?

Mr. HALE. I think the subcommittee will take cognizance of that, and every other matter that comes up in relation to the conduct of the war, and will then do what it sees fit.

Mr. PHELAN. Then, the subcommittee will pass upon the propriety or the impropriety of the revelation made by Admiral Sims?

Mr. HALE. In the course of the investigation I have no doubt of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. May the Chair inquire whether this is before the Senate or not? Is the resolution before the Senate?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] asked that it go over under the rule, and the Senator from Montana seemed to have some doubt as to whether that was an objection when I said, "I object," and I thought I said it clearly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then it is over now under the rule.

CORPORATE EARNING AND GOVERNMENT REVENUE.

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 286), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed 1,000 copies of Senate Document 259, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session, entitled "Corporate Earning and Government Revenue," for the use of the Senate document room.

WHITE RIVER BRIDGE.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3371) authorizing Gordon N. Peay, jr., his heirs and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge and approaches thereto across the White River.

Mr. KIRBY. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House, request a conference of the two Houses on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice President appointed Mr. CALDER, Mr. EDGE, and Mr. KIRBY conferees on the part of the Senate.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 11053. An act to transfer the county of Early from the northern judicial district of Georgia to the southern judicial district of Georgia was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AUGUSTA LOUISE DE HAVEN-ALTEN.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, before moving to take up Senate joint resolution 234, to readmit Augusta Louise de Haven-Alten to the status and privileges of a citizen of the United States, I ask leave to say a word regarding it, because I feel there will then be no objection to its consideration and passage.

The joint resolution seeks to repatriate Augusta Louise de Haven-Alten, an American woman, now over 50 years of age, who was married to a German, who instituted proceedings for a divorce some years before the outbreak of hostilities, but who, under a German decree, was unable to go forward with those proceedings during the course of the war. She has long been separated from her husband, who, through the agency of the German Government, has sequestrated her property in Germany. Mrs. de Haven-Alten, therefore, is almost penniless because, in view of her German citizenship, she can not touch her property in this country.

She is the daughter of an officer of the United States Navy. Consideration of her case by the subcommittee and by the Immigration Committee has resulted in the unanimous report of the joint resolution to which I have referred.

We have precedents, of course, in the case of Mrs. Scoville-Mumm, the resolution covering whom has passed the Senate in the present Congress; and the case of Mrs. Nellie Grant Sartoris. I hope that there may be no objection to the joint resolution, as Mrs. de Haven-Alten is almost in a state of penury, I am informed.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the effect of the joint resolution is to restore American citizenship to some American lady who married an alien enemy?

Mr. McCORMICK. Precisely, exactly like the case of Mrs. Scoville-Mumm, which was considered by the Senate some weeks ago.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I suppose there are a great number of women in the same situation.

Mr. McCORMICK. I dare say, Mr. President.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then would it not be quite appropriate to pass some general legislation, instead of extending our favors to particular individuals who have friends in the Senate?

Mr. McCORMICK. This lady, so far as I know, has no friends in the Senate. I have not even ever seen her. Her tragic case was related to me by a mutual friend who sought the introduction of this joint resolution in view of the Senate's favorable action upon the resolution restoring citizenship to Mrs. Scoville-Mumm.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But if the lady is in no different situation from that of a large number of other women, why should not the legislation be general and let all take advantage of it?

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, if the Senator would introduce a resolution to that end, certainly I should not oppose it. If I were a member of the Immigration Committee I should very seriously consider the propriety of the committee introducing such legislation. I know only this tragic case of this old woman, who has broken with her children upon the issue of the war, who has sought a divorce from her husband, and who is now in Washington poverty stricken. That was my only reason for introducing the joint resolution.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I understood there was some difference between this case and the ordinary case arising out of the fact that she had divorce proceedings pending before the war began.

Mr. McCORMICK. She had. The Senator from Nebraska is absolutely right.

There being no objection the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Whereas Augusta Louise de Haven-Alten, daughter of the late Capt. Joseph Edwin de Haven, of the United States Navy, a native-born citizen of the United States, and a resident of the State of Illinois, married in 1886 Eberhard Alten, an alien of German birth and parentage; and

Whereas the said Augusta Louise de Haven-Alten left Germany in 1911 and has not since returned, and in 1912 sued her said husband for absolute divorce, which suit is still pending in Germany, and has since 1911 lived apart from her said husband; and

Whereas the said Augusta Louise de Haven-Alten has since returned to the United States and renewed her residence therein and petitioned Congress to be readmitted to the status and privileges of a citizen of the United States, under and by virtue of the power and laws of the United States of America: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That Augusta Louise de Haven-Alten, daughter of Capt. Joseph Edwin de Haven, be, and she is hereby, on her own application unconditionally readmitted to the character and privileges of a citizen of the United States.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

COAL CORPORATION INCOMES.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution No. 247.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution which proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish the Senate certain detailed information secured from income and profits tax returns of the taxable year 1918 as to relative incomes of all corporations engaged in mining coal.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I desire to offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Add at the end of the resolution the following:

Be it further resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to furnish the Senate, from the income-tax returns for the taxable year 1918, a list of all miners and mine workers employed at lignite and bituminous coal mines, together with the gross income of each of said miners and mine workers, the income tax paid by them and each of them, and the net income of the same.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator introducing the resolution what will be the expense to the Government in complying with it, particularly if the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey is accepted?

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey will not be agreed to, because it would result in delay in procuring the information desired under the resolution.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. May I ask that the Senator repeat his statement? I could not hear him.

Mr. HARRIS. I stated that I hope the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey will not be agreed to, because of the expense and delay in getting the desired information.

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] has proposed an amendment which would require the Secretary of the Treasury to give information in regard to all corporations, and I shall favor that.

I called the office of the Secretary of the Treasury this morning and talked with Mr. Roper in regard to the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia. He told me that the President some days ago had requested the Treasury Department to get for the Coal Commission the information desired under my resolution, and that the information was ready, and he could furnish it to the Senate without delay, but that it would take some time to get all the information desired by the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia, which amendment I favor.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not recall that the Senator stated what Mr. Roper's estimate of the cost would be if the resolution was agreed to as originally introduced.

Mr. HARRIS. The information requested by the resolution introduced by me is all ready, and has been furnished to the Coal Commission, and would not require any expense or delay. The other information would require 90 days or more and the assistance of about 200 clerks.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to say in response to what the Senator from Georgia has just stated that in 1918 a similar resolution was passed by the Senate, calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish the identical information which is now suggested by my amendment. The resolution was passed on the 6th of June, and the information was furnished to this body on the 5th day of July, one day less than one month. So the figures now given by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue seem to be somewhat excessive, at least as to the time required to give the information to the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. I asked Mr. Roper if he could not get it within a shorter length of time than 90 days, and told him of the time required 2 years ago, which was about 30 days. He said that at that time he put all the employees on that work, and that now the Government would lose about $25,000,000 of delinquent taxes if he put all the force upon this work, but that he could furnish it within 90 days.

Mr. THOMAS. I have no doubt it will take an enormous office force and considerable time to prepare the information which the resolution and the amendment will embrace. I can perceive as much necessity for the one as for the other, but I have a fundamental objection to the resolution itself. It is in direct and distinct violation of the laws of the United States. Under the revenue laws——

The VICE PRESIDENT. This is a Senate resolution?

Mr. HARRIS. It is.

Mr. THOMAS. It is a Senate resolution, not a joint or concurrent resolution.

The revenue laws of the United States provide that these returns shall not be disclosed to the public, but gives the President authority, under certain conditions, in his discretion, to disclose their contents. It appears from the statement of the Senator from Georgia that the information has been given to the Coal Commission and I have no doubt that it has been given in strict accordance with the law. We now have a Senate resolution proposing to instruct an official of the Government to disregard the law which he is sworn to support and to disclose to the Senate information which under that law he can not disclose except as the President shall direct.

I make the point of order, therefore, Mr. President, that the resolution and the amendment are both beyond the power of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair sustains the point of order. The resolution is not in order, as it is a Senate resolution violating an act of Congress.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to ask if it would be in order to amend the resolution by providing that it shall be within the discretion of the President? That is the wording of the law.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say that even that will not do. I want to say to the Senator from Georgia, as I said before when the resolution was up for consideration, that it is not that I object to the information being furnished, but that the Senator is trying to repeal an act of Congress by a Senate resolution. If the Senate wants to make it a joint resolution and allow the House to pass upon it, too, that is a different thing entirely.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. A joint resolution, in the opinion of the Chair, would be in order, but not a Senate resolution.

Mr. BORAH. That is what I was going to suggest. A joint resolution would accomplish it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly; a joint resolution for the purpose would be in order.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, if I am in order, I should like to say to the Senator from Georgia that at the present time there is a Senate committee investigating the coal question, and they intend to procure from the operators themselves, from their books, the profits that they are making.

I desire, further, to say that the committee also intend to procure information regarding the wages that are now being paid. I have no sympathy with any coal operator who is making an unfair profit, but I seriously object to the effort that is now being made to raise the miners' wages 14 per cent and give publicity to the fact that that 14 per cent will be taken out of the operators, when it will not. When that 14 per cent is to be imposed on the consumer, as it has been in my State, increasing the expense to the public service corporations $500,000 in the cost of their coal and indirectly increasing the cost to the consumer, it is time to call a halt.

The motive of the resolution, which, I strongly suspect, is to show that the operators are making an unusual profit in order that a still further advance may be made in the miners' wages and that it can then be imposed upon the operators, which is not possible under the contracts that prevail now between the operators and the large consumers of coal.

For that reason I offered my amendment to show that the miners of the country are now earning a wage far beyond what skilled workmen in other employments are making. I want the whole question shown up, if the committee are not to be intrusted with the further duty of procuring the information.

AWARDS OF NAVAL DECORATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any further morning business?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, at the close of the session yesterday afternoon I introduced Senate resolution No. 285, providing counsel and clerical assistance be given the subcommittee which is investigating the question of awards in the Navy. No action was taken on the resolution. An amendment was offered, and, a lack of quorum having been developed, the Senate adjourned. I should like to ask what is the parliamentary status of the resolution?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair finds upon his return that according to the calendar Senate bill 3315 is the unfinished business, but the Chair does not believe it. The Chair thinks the resolution of the Senator from Maine is the unfinished business.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the RECORD show that unanimous consent was asked that the unfinished business should be temporarily laid aside?

The VICE PRESIDENT. I have not examined that. I presume it was taken up by unanimous consent.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought that was asked by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], and in that case, of course, Senate bill 3315 would be the unfinished business. However, the RECORD does not show that unanimous consent was asked.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The RECORD shows as follows:

> The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution?
> The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.
> * * * * * * *
> The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from California.

Then the point of no quorum was made and there was an adjournment. I think the tangle ought to be gotten out of the way. It is in order for the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] to move to proceed to consider the resolution.

Mr. HALE. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. THOMAS. I suppose that carries with it the amendment offered yesterday by the Senator from California?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The amendment proposed by the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] is to strike out, in line 10, the words "counsel and," so as to read "to employ such clerical assistants as it may deem necessary," and so forth.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HALE. I am very glad to yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. For the information of some Senators now present who were not here at the adjournment on yesterday I may state that the objection offered to the resolution is confined to that part of it which proposes to employ counsel. During the discussion yesterday afternoon it was stated by the Senator from Maine, having charge of the resolution, that it was not contemplated that counsel should be used for the examination of witnesses or to conduct the hearings, but for the purpose of arranging and digesting the testimony. The question then presented itself as to whether counsel was necessary for what seemed to be merely clerical duty.

Such investigations are necessarily expensive, but they should not be needlessly so. Some of us think that it is not required that the committee should employ expensive counsel for the purpose of abstracting or digesting testimony.

I should make no objection if the committee felt that in the proper conduct of the hearing the assistance of counsel to conduct it was necessary, but I object most decidedly to the employment of professional men to do clerical work. Any competent clerical assistant can do the work that it is proposed shall be done by expensive counsel, and when I say expensive counsel I refer to the fact that counsel employed in such positions are expensive. I do not see why we should subject the Treasury to this additional burden when it is so obviously needless.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I feel that we shall unquestionably need counsel in going ahead with the investigation. My first idea was that we should require counsel to take part in the hearings and to help conduct the examination of witnesses, but the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], who are on the subcommittee, were very much opposed to that. We therefore agreed with them that if we were allowed counsel we would not ask that counsel should take part in the hearings, but would have him assist us in every way in the matter of examining records and in every other way except to take actual part in the hearings. We feel that we need this assistance, and I am very much in hopes that the Senate will allow us the counsel that we ask for.

It seems to me that the charges made in the letter of Admiral Sims are so sweeping in their nature and are made from a man in so very high authority that everybody must want to have the matter very carefully investigated. If, as I think very probable, the investigation will lead to a review of the entire naval conduct of the war, we can not have too much assistance in making the investigation. After the subcommittee have considered the matter and have unanimously reported that they need this counsel and this clerical assistance I can not conceive that any Senator can find it possible to make an objection to the resolution.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I can very well understand how essential it is that some good clerical man be employed to go through the immense correspondence that the committee or its members may have to wade through, and to make compilations therefrom, so that the members of the committee can interrogate the witnesses. I know from experience in a long investigation which the Military Affairs Committee had that it was almost impossible to go through the correspondence, the complaints, the criminations and recriminations, but we did not even have additional clerical assistance; and I do not believe any counsel is needed to advise the committee, because there are very able lawyers on the committee.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, it seems to me that is a question for the committee to decide. We have already done more or less work on this investigation, and we have found that we very much need the services of counsel. Now, if we get counsel, he will have to go over all of the records and the letters and the testimony, and he will have to pick out from them the salient matters that we are going to need in the investigation. His responsibility will be very great, and, in my opinion, no man but a skilled lawyer would be competent to take this responsibility.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HALE. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think the former chairman of the Military Affairs Committee will admit that our investigation of the War Department during the war took practically the entire time of all the committee, and that we practically did nothing else. Now we are encountering many of the afterwar problems, and in my opinion no investigation should be carried on unless it is thorough; and I do not believe that the Members of this body can carry on a thorough investigation with their other duties. I believe it is necessary not only to have clerical assistance but to have legal assistance to arrange hearings and the program of the hearings. If any Senator on this committee or subcommittee had the time, undoubtedly he could make the investigation; but it seems to me, the Senate having ordered the committee to make an investigation, and expecting it to be thorough, that it should be up to the chairman of the committee and the committee itself to determine its policy. I myself intend to ask in the coal hearing for assistance, because the other members of the committee and myself can not give their full time to the investigation; and if it is to be done thoroughly—and I think you must rely on the good faith of the chairman of the committee and the subcommittee, and trust them, because they are not trying in any way to impose an additional or unnecessary burden on the Senate—I think at least you have got to have confidence enough in the committee to let them determine whether or not they need this legal assistance.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to interrupt him, it is not a question of trusting the committee. We all have the highest confidence in all of the committees of the Senate. It is simply a question of expense, and there is no telling where it will end. With a competent secretary or a competent clerk—an additional clerk, if you please, or two additional clerks—to go through this testimony and make a synopsis of it for the benefit of the members of the committee, there is not any question in my mind—and my view is strengthened by what took place here in the Senate this morning—but that the committee will get at the truth. There probably will be some members of the committee who will be disposed to criticize the Secretary of the Navy or to feel that he is responsible. There will be some on the committee who will feel disposed to criticize Admiral Sims. All sides of the controversy will have an opportunity to bring witnesses before the committee and interrogate every witness that comes there, and the truth will come out.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, may I again interrupt the Senator? The Senator well knows that that is not the question. The question is whether the Senate is going to yield to the request of the committee that they have this additional assistance. They feel that they need it, and I think it is up to the Senate to follow their wishes.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the charges that have been made in Admiral Sims's letter are not going to be overlooked. The welfare of the whole naval service demands that they be not overlooked. As chairman of the subcommittee I have stated that in my opinion the investigation can not be properly carried on unless we are given counsel. I should like to ask the Senator if he thinks it is better to have us go ahead without counsel and make a failure of the investigation or to spend the amount that is necessary for counsel and have a decent and proper and full investigation?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, in answer to that question, let me say that the Senator has himself assured the Senate that the counsel is not to be used for the purposes for which counsel are generally employed before committees. If the Senator says that, in his judgment, it is necessary to have counsel to conduct the hearings, I will vote for his motion. Yesterday, however, it was stated, as I understood, that counsel was needed—I do not pretend to use the exact language of the Senator—for clerical purposes, for digesting the evidence, for abstracting it, for arranging it, for systematizing it. Now, any experienced clerical man could do that. It is not professional work; that is to say, it is not legal professional work. My objection is, therefore, let me repeat, not that the committee desires counsel for the work of counsel, but that it desires counsel for the work of a clerk; and I think therefore we should pay for clerical and not for legal help under those circumstances.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have already stated that I should prefer to have competent counsel who would conduct the hearings and conduct any cross-examination that might be made.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will say now that that is what he wants counsel for I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. HALE. But I do not. I have already explained that I withdrew from my position on that matter at the request of the other Senators on the committee. As I have already said, also, the counsel who will assist us, if we are allowed counsel, will have much more to do than clerical work.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me a moment, I think perhaps I was the one who spoke about counsel being used only in the work of preparing the case, and that was what I understood was the intention of the subcommittee. It seems to me, in view of the wide expansion which has come to this inquiry, that it is but a reasonable request that they should have counsel, and that counsel will be under the direction of the subcommittee to do anything they ask him to do; and I should suppose that in getting him to prepare evidence they would naturally employ him, as the Senator from Colorado very truly says, to perform the ordinary duties of counsel.

I want to say one further word. I do not want to delay this matter, but I want to say a single word as to the only question that is before us, and that is the need of this additional assistance.

This began as an inquiry into the awards. That, I think, could have been managed by the committee, with the proper clerical assistance. Now, however, by the publication of that letter, they have become involved in what amounts to an inquiry into the conduct of the war in foreign waters. It seems to me that the inquiry has taken a very wide range, and that it is only reasonable that they should have what I have never known to be refused to any committee—the assistance, by counsel or clerks or otherwise, necessary to conduct such an important inquiry properly.

I am sure no Senator on either side has the slightest desire to suppress this inquiry. It is too important; it is too important to the country and to the Navy; and I think we ought to give the subcommittee any assistance they need in conducting it properly and concluding it rapidly.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, the language of the resolution provides for the amendment of the former resolution on the subject so as to—

Authorize and empower the subcommittee appointed to consider the question of awards in the Navy to employ such counsel and clerical assistants as it may deem necessary.

My motion is to strike out the words "counsel and," so that it will read "to employ such clerical assistants." There is no limit upon the number of assistants authorized, and, of course, if they desire attorneys or experts they can employ them, but they will be known as clerical assistants, and there can be no conceivable reason for inserting the word "counsel," which is plural—it may involve many attorneys in this authorization—unless they want the counsel to do the work of a counsel. A counsel will cost the committee, say, $100 a day. An expert clerk will cost the committee $10 a day. Retrenchment has been loudly preached. This is a matter of expense, and a needless expense, because the chairman of the committee admits that the counsel is not expected to do the work of a counsel, but simply to act in what is really a clerical capacity.

I desire to point out that in the composition of this committee we find three lawyers, and one gentleman who has had honorable service in the Navy and Navy Department of the United States. It seems to me the committee is very well qualified to investigate the subject without establishing a bad precedent of employing counsel. In fact, it is intimated here by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] that he is also going to ask for counsel; and if once this precedent is established every committee, possibly, to avoid the labors which necessarily fall upon Senators, will ask for counsel. The three attorneys on the committee are counsel enough, and the member of the committee familiar with naval affairs from actual experience and service is a very valuable coadjutor. So I take it that the committee is well composed for the purpose of carrying on this very important investigation.

I noticed yesterday that the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] complained that the committee was insulted by the flippant conduct of the witness, where laughter was evoked by his remarks, in derogation of the dignity of a committee of the Senate of the United States. I submit that they need a sergeant at arms more than they need a counsel, and that the committee itself should be capable of conducting its own business.

Mr. HITCHCOCK and Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I doubt whether the Senate realizes the extent to which it is indulging in the investigation business. Both Houses of Congress combined, so far as we have gone in the Sixty-sixth Congress, have authorized 61 investigations, and a very large number of those are in the Senate itself. That is compared with 31 investigations during the whole of the Sixty-fifth Congress in both Houses.

Mr. President, we have had recent experience with this matter of employing counsel. It was suggested that we should employ counsel for the committee that is investigating Russian propaganda in this country. I objected to the immediate consideration of the resolution, and suggested that if legal advice were necessary the expense could be avoided by calling upon the Department of Justice to furnish it. That matter was brushed aside, however; and later, upon the assurance of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON]—whose resolution was the one originally adopted—that the committee would in all probability employ Mr. Stevenson, a lawyer who was already familiar with the case and who had been ardent in developing it—and whose fees, for that reason, would not be large—I abandoned opposition to that resolution. Later I discovered that when the committee acted, instead of employing this patriotic lawyer, who had been giving his services to the Lusk committee in New York free of charge as a matter of public service and public spirit, the committee had discarded him and had employed Mr. Wade H. Ellis, a lawyer no doubt of great ability, but, as I understand, a Republican leader of even greater prominence.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, when I talked to the Senator I was very much in hopes that Mr. Stevenson would be employed. I had no intention of misleading the Senator in any way, but, of course, I had nothing to do with the matter; and it seems that objections were raised to Mr. Stevenson which the committee thought might imperil the investigation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have no doubt whatever of the Senator's entire good faith, and I would not for a moment in what I say reflect upon him in any way. I know he was sincere in his belief that Mr. Stevenson would be employed. I only cite it to show the reason why I abandoned my position at that time. Now, Mr. President, it looks to me as though that investigation has developed into a political persecution, and that instead of employing a lawyer qualified for the work we have entered upon an investigation and employed a lawyer who knows nothing about the case, but who is eminent as a Republican party leader.

Mr. President, this idea of employing counsel for these investigating committees has no limit. No one can tell where it is going to stop. Sixty-one investigations have already been ordered, and a number of them are already applying to the Senate for leave to employ counsel in order to carry on the work that the committee is charged with doing.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, does the Senator think that any investigation ought to be made of this question of the charges in Admiral Sims's letter?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, Mr. President, I withhold the opinion that I am gradually forming as to the investigation of those charges. I would not like to give to my friend the Senator from Maine the opinion which is developing in my mind and in the country as to the purpose of that investigation.

Mr. HALE. I shall appreciate it if, when the opinion is fully developed in the Senator's mind, he will give it to me.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Possibly I may; but for the present I withhold it, because I desire to be more sure of my ground. I am sure, however, that in the last Congress—the Sixty-fifth Congress—while there were a number of very serious and very effective investigations, they were carried on without the aid of counsel. Probably the most effective investigation held was the one already referred to, conducted by the Committee on Military Affairs, which did a remarkable work in bringing the War Department up to the efficiency that the country demanded. The Senators on the Committee on Military Affairs worked in that investigation. They might easily have asked the Senate for counsel to facilitate their work; but, instead of doing that, they labored themselves, and carried on that work without any legal assistance. So I think investigating committees, if they are to be constituted under this control of the Senate, might well do the same thing, instead of calling in outside expensive counsel to aid them with the work; and I for one shall not vote for the employment of counsel upon any such showing as is made by this committee in this case.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I want to call to the attention of the Senator from Maine a fact which I understand there has been some question about. He states that this was a unanimous vote of the committee. The Senator from Florida assures me that he opposed the idea of employing counsel, and only submitted when, in the subcommittee, he was overridden.

Mr. HALE. I stated that at the subcommittee meeting yesterday it was the unanimous agreement of all of us that I was to put in a resolution asking for counsel and for clerical assistance. That was my understanding of the situation. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] is in the Chamber. I will ask him if that was not his understanding.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, upon yesterday we met in Senator HALE's office, and Senator HALE suggested this situation; but I stated to him very frankly, as I think he will agree, that I was always opposed to having attorneys around committees.

Mr. HALE. Yes; that is true.

Mr. PITTMAN. But that I would not object to having any kind of assistance that the committee might feel necessary, even of counsel or attorney, provided that we have an understanding among ourselves, as we did have, that if counsel were employed he should take no part in the examination of the witnesses——

Mr. HALE. That was my understanding exactly.

Mr. PITTMAN. Or in any way interfere with any of the members of the subcommittee in their examination of any of the witnesses; in other words, that his assistance, whatever it might be, would be in the nature of clerical assistance or advice to any one of the subcommittee who might ask for it. It was in the nature of a compromise to that extent. I think the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] and I both opposed having counsel around the subcommittee, but the compromise was of that nature, that we would support a resolution for counsel provided it was understood that the counsel should in no way interfere with the investigation or take part in it.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] has just come into the Chamber. I will ask the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] to repeat the statement that he just made to me so that the Senator from Florida may answer it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I made the statement, in the absence of the Senator from Florida, that there appeared to have been a difference of opinion upon the subcommittee as to the wisdom of employing counsel, and that I had understood the Senator from Maine to have said that the committee was unanimously in favor——

Mr. HALE. My statement had nothing to do with the wisdom of it. My statement was that we had agreed that we should employ counsel.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I will explain my attitude. I think I can best do that myself. The question came up in regard to the matter of employing counsel. I stated to the subcommittee that I was opposed to employing counsel. Then the suggestion came with regard to employing counsel and not permitting counsel to interrogate the witnesses nor conduct the hearings before the subcommittee. I stated then that if counsel was employed at all I would very much object to him being permitted to conduct the hearings and to interrogate witnesses. You might say that it was practically a matter of yielding to the majority of the subcommittee that we should have counsel, with the distinct understanding that he would not conduct the examination before the subcommittee.

Mr. HALE. Did not the Senator agree that I was authorized to put in the resolution, and did I not show the Senator the resolution before I put it in, and did he not consent to it?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I do not consider that when the chairman of a subcommittee frames a resolution that is prepared for the purpose of carrying out the wishes of a majority of the committee it means that you approve of it, although you might have expressed your position against it before the subcommittee.

Mr. HALE. There was no formal vote taken in the subcommittee. We simply agreed, and all of us agreed. There was no question about it.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I take it that the chairman was showing it to me as a matter of carrying out the wishes of a majority of the subcommittee, not that he did it for the purpose of getting my approval. I reserved no right to protest against it in the Senate; but the Senator from Maine knows I did state that I was opposed to the employment of counsel by the subcommittee.

Mr. HALE. I stated the matters exactly as they occurred. I have nothing to take back. Now, however, in view of the feeling which evidently exists on the other side of the Chamber, I feel that it will not be advisable for the subcommittee to be longer bound by any agreement as to counsel, and I now state that if this resolution of mine goes through I shall see that competent counsel is retained, who shall have full authority, as I see fit, or as a majority of the subcommittee sees fit to give it to him, to conduct any investigations or to do any other work which we may need. I have in mind for such counsel ex-Senator Sutherland, of Utah, who is in this city. I am not at all certain that he would undertake the work; I have had no talk with him in any way; but some such able lawyer I believe could and would carry on an investigation and get to the bottom of this matter.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, that is a very frank statement of the Senator from Maine, and he deserves credit for it. To my mind, however, it makes matters worse. It is very evident that the intention is to convert as many as possible of the 61 investigations that have already been ordered into partisan proceedings. It is proposed to go on with this orgy of investigations, and establish as many tribunals as possible, and employ as many lawyers as possible, to work up as many cases as possible, as a method of attacking this administration in every possible form; and I am in favor, if it is proposed to carry on proceedings of that sort, to have the Senators who are desirous of doing it, do it themselves. I am not in favor of having Republican politicians and Republican party leaders called in on the pay of the Senate of the United States to carry on these cases.

These investigations of committees, which it is now proposed to increase in numbers and inspire with a partisan purpose, can be carried on by the Senators themselves. There has never been a more thorough investigation by the Senate than was made by the Committee on Military Affairs last year, and it did not require a paid counsel to enable that committee to bring about a great reform.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Will the Senator suffer an interruption?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The full committee undertook that investigation, did they not? It was a hearing before the full committee, was it not, not a subcommittee?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; it was such originally.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. And they gave their entire time to it?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Oh, no.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Practically, hearings were held every day and the members were in attendance?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No. I was probably as active as anyone else in those investigations, and I can say to the Senator that I by no means gave all my time to it. I worked hard upon it, I felt earnestly about it, and I did my work in a way to satisfy my own conscience. If any Senators believe there is anything wrong, it is for them in their investigations to bring it out. But I do not think that they should ask the Senate to employ expensive counsel, and then use their power as the majority to select as that counsel in each case Republican politicians and Republican leaders. That certainly will discredit the investigations before the country, and the frank avowal now made by the Senator from Maine that he proposes, if counsel shall be employed under this resolution, to authorize the counsel to conduct investigations before the committee, to ask questions before the committee, simply means that the majority of the committee is going to empower that man to run roughshod over the minority of the committee, and instead of an investigation we are going to have a prosecution.

Mr. HALE. The majority of the subcommittee expect to get at the root of the matter; and let me say, in explanation of the suggestion that I made, that I shall not, of course, expect the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] or the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] to support my plan. I consider them released from any obligation to support the resolution when I make this new proposition.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I suppose the Senate would like to vote on this proposition before 2 o'clock, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to announce the absence, on account of illness, of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], and I ask that the announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, in view of the statement made by the chairman of the subcommittee of the Naval Affairs Committee, I feel at liberty, even as far as he is concerned, and if he had not made the statement I would have felt at liberty to oppose this resolution in view of the statement he made in regard to giving counsel, if selected by the subcommittee, broad latitude to conduct the examination practically as he may deem proper. I am opposed to the employment of counsel to practically take charge of the investigation before the subcommittee. I will state, Mr. President, that I believe as a rule that in making investigations counsel assumes the attitude of a prosecuting attorney. My observation in legislative branches of the Government has been that if you employ an attorney his main object, as a rule, instead of trying to get at the facts from the standpoint of fairness, is to try to bring about a conviction or the condemnation of some one who is being investigated.

I know of one committee of the Senate that employed counsel for at least two or three months to conduct an investigation, and after that two or three months of labor he prepared a report for the subcommittee and it was signed by four members of the subcommittee before reaching my hands for signature, and I decided that I would do probably the unusual thing and read the report before I signed it. So I read the report and I found, among other things that the counsel had recommended, and four other members of the subcommittee had signed it, that the board for the young ladies who were occupying the Government dormitories should be increased $15 per month, so that the Government could get 5 per cent interest, based upon the original investment in those dormitories.

I found also that in the question of dealing with buildings he had stated in this report that members of the committee, when they looked upon the magnificent buildings being occupied by mechanics at some particular place, suffered with pangs of residential jealousy. That is just a little illustration to show you the viewpoint of a counsel and an attorney and his object in dealing with these matters. He was looking on the whole proposition very largely as a matter of trying to condemn somebody. The report, however, was changed after I read it. I think, Mr. President, that you have a fairer investigation if you do not select counsel who is to go in and act as a prosecuting attorney. My observation has been that they assume that attitude very generally, and I do not feel like having anyone to take up an investigation with a view of trying to convict somebody or trying to clear anybody, but I want the investigation to be actuated by a sense of fairness all the way through. For that reason I object to employing counsel. I do not mean any reflection upon the attorney employed by the other committee to which I have made reference, but merely referred to this case to show the trend of counsel in such matters.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3315) to promote Americanization by providing for cooperation with the several States in the education of non-English-speaking persons and the assimilation of foreign-born residents, and for other purposes.

Mr. HALE. May I ask the chairman of the committee in charge of the unfinished business that he consent to its being temporarily laid aside?

Mr. KENYON. If there is any reasonable prospect of a vote within a reasonable time, I have no objection.

Mr. HALE. I think we are nearly upon the verge of a vote on the resolution. It is very important that we should have it decided.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I can assure the Senator that he is not on the verge of a vote. We are on the verge of hearing a number of other speeches.

Mr. HALE. I do not know how long the Senator intends to filibuster on the matter.

Mr. KENYON. In view of the statement of the Senator from Nebraska that other speeches will be made, does the Senator from Maine still desire to lay aside the unfinished business?

Mr. HALE. I would like an hour's time in which to discuss the resolution.

Mr. KENYON. I am going to make no objection to an hour's time.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. ROBINSON. I object.

Mr. HALE. Then, I move that the unfinished business be laid aside and that we proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. POINDEXTER. For an hour's time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator can not move to lay aside the unfinished business.

Mr. HALE. Then I move to take up the resolution.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I understand that is a debatable question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I was absent, being called out to the telephone, when the Senator from Maine was making a statement. It was attributed to him in that statement that he intended to withdraw from the agreement made with the minority members of the subcommittee, such as I have stated, to the effect that the counsel, if appointed under this resolution, would not be restricted from conducting an examination.

Mr. HALE. The only reason for any agreement was that we wanted to have the committee harmonious on the matter; and our understanding was that if we gave up on the question of having counsel take part in the hearings that there would be no opposition. The Senator did not promise that there would not be opposition in the Senate, but clearly his whole party is in opposition, and under the circumstances I see no objection to withdrawing from the agreement. In doing so, of course, I do not expect the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] or the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] to follow me in voting for the resolution.

Mr. PITTMAN. The situation was, as I stated before, that I opposed the appointment of counsel for the committee, but finally consented that I would not oppose the resolution under the agreement then entered into, that the counsel should not question witnesses or participate in the examination of witnesses. I know of nothing that I have done to cause the Senator to violate that agreement; I know of no reason why he should violate it, except that he feels he can do so with impunity. It is a warning as to what will take place when the Senator realizes the power of the majority on the subcommittee with counsel sitting there.

I had absolute confidence as to the intention of the chairman of the committee and the members of the majority with regard to the employment of this counsel, and for that reason I forewent my prejudice to having attorneys for any committee; but we have scarcely more than arrived in the Chamber when, apparently, the Senator from Maine seeks the first excuse to throw down and eliminate any restriction that might have been agreed upon.

It is a very unpleasant thing for a minority to serve on a committee if the majority see fit to ignore them. It is perfectly possible for the majority to make it so unpleasant for the minority that they will be compelled to withdraw from the committee. It is perfectly possible for a majority of the committee, if they see fit, to so limit the scope of inquiry of the minority that the action of the minority in the matter, instead of accomplishing any good, may seem to be such as to prejudice the case as viewed by the minority.

The matter of the investigation of the medal awards has gone far enough to indicate two things; that, in the first place, the majority are very anxious to sustain the charges of Admiral Sims with regard to medal awards——

Mr. HALE. If they are true.

Mr. PITTMAN. It is also, I think, evident that the minority on that committee are doing everything to counteract that effort. It is very unfortunate, so far as the Senate and the country are concerned, that that development has taken place. All of us like to be fair, and yet it is a very difficult matter, of course, to be fair. It is very hard for a person to throw off his political allegiance in the matters that have affected him during his life.

Now, to accentuate the contest that has unfortunately arisen in the committee, it is the purpose to employ an outside man; to employ an attorney who will be under the absolute and exclusive direction of the majority of the committee and to have him work not for the committee but for the majority of the committee. That is inevitable; it can not be any other way. If a question arises as to what the counsel shall do, it comes to a vote, and there is no question that all members of the majority would vote together. That is in evidence already by the hearings so far as they have gone on the medal award. That really has not been so bitterly contested by the majority as we have a right to expect the other matter will be contested. That matter involves an attack upon the Navy board as well as upon the Secretary of the Navy. This matter is a personal attack by an admiral, by one man, upon his superior officer.

If the question involved some intricate law that able lawyers like the Senator from Maine could not be expected to be familiar with, there might be some excuse for employing counsel. We have been having an investigation of a naval law. It involves three or four thousand cases, I believe; it involves just that many different cases to investigate; it involves the construction of a very indefinite statute under which these awards are made, and yet the distinguished Senator and lawyer from Maine has not found himself at any disadvantage in the investigation. He has conducted his side of it most ably and clearly without any doubt whatever.

But, in addition to that matter, we have on the committee on the majority side, as has been stated already, one who should be an expert in naval matters. We have there on the majority side an ex-Secretary of the Navy. All of the advantage is with the Republican majority in this matter as far as the conduct of the hearing is concerned; but there has already in the hearing been evinced considerable impatience with certain portions of the examination that the minority wish to make. The minority Senators have been interrupted in the middle of their examination by the majority. Why, as a matter of fact, the Senator from Nevada was conducting the cross-examination of Admiral Sims when he was interrupted right in the midst of it, at the request of the chairman of the committee, for the purpose of injecting the Sims letter into the matter. The Senator from Nevada desired to go on, and resisted the suggestion that the character of the examination should be interfered with by the injection of this letter into the record; but it happened, and then, when the reading of the letter was completed, at a quarter of 1 o'clock, and there were yet 15 minutes left before the hour of adjournment agreed on had arrived, and the Senator from Nevada asked to be allowed to continue with his examination, he was sat down upon instantly by a motion on the side of the majority to adjourn. That motion to adjourn was carried without the permission of any further cross-examination, and yet there were 15 minutes left.

I am only citing these things for the purpose of disclosing that even when there was not any counsel present to monopolize the proceedings the minority members found some difficulty in continuing their part of the examination. Now, it is proposed to have an attorney, a man who is not a Member of this body, a man who is not even bound by the courtesies that sometimes exist between Members of this body, a man who has not even the slightest knowledge of the ethics of this body, not as much so as some of the newest Members of the body. He is to come in there and investigate for us; that is his function. He is to go out and dig up what he considers is material evidence bearing on this question. There is no limit whatever to the scope of his investigation nor the scope of the trial that he may direct. He is nominally the counsel of the committee; he is in fact the counsel of the majority of the committee; there is no question about that; there is no use in mincing words about it.

We all know that is a fact. He consumes the time of the investigation. If, perchance, one of the Senators on the minority side should have a few ideas with regard to certain facts that he desired to develop by questioning, he would find it exceedingly difficult to break in upon that examination. You say "no." Why, when you did not have any counsel our examination was interrupted in the middle of it, and you adjourned.

We have not any controlling vote as to what is going to happen in this matter. You first agree that this counsel shall not interfere and then you come upon the floor, knowing that you have the majority, and believing, as I believe you do believe, that those of you on that side desire to make all you can politically out of this, and you go back on the agreement which you had with the minority members of the committee.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have heard about enough of the talk of the Senator in reference to breaking agreements. The Senator knows very well I endeavored yesterday afternoon and this morning to carry out the arrangement that we had and that that arrangement has been bitterly opposed by Senators on his side of the Chamber. It is evident that they are not backing up the arrangement in any way, and therefore I have felt at perfect liberty to change our plans. As I said before, I do not expect the Senator from Nevada or the Senator from Florida, the minority members of the subcommittee, to vote with me now.

Mr. PITTMAN. Undoubtedly the Senator has no reason to expect that; nevertheless I have very rarely, and I hope never—I do not remember of it—broken an agreement with a Senator by reason of the act of some other Senator. The Senator from Nevada did not go back on his agreement; in fact, the Senator from Nevada rose on the floor before the Senator from Maine took his present course and sustained the Senator from Maine by stating that we did have an agreement.

Mr. HALE. I have followed out in every way any possible obligation that I was under through that arrangement.

Mr. PITTMAN. And now that some other Senator, who is not a party to the agreement——

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Nevada is evidently opposed to having counsel take part in the hearings——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. PITTMAN. I am always willing to yield to the Senator. However, he interrupted in the middle of a sentence which I was trying to complete. I want to say that that character of interruption is customary upon the subcommittee, and will probably be largely exaggerated after we have counsel there to advise us when we may and when we may not ask questions.

Mr. HALE. I had no idea this feeling existed about our hearings. I had the idea that the committee hearings were going along very comfortably.

Mr. PITTMAN. Well, Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield to the Senator from Maine. The only thing about it is that the Senator from Maine will be accused of filibustering in a few moments.

Mr. HALE. Well, never mind.

Mr. PITTMAN. Everything went smoothly on the subcommittee. There was absolutely no physical disorder from the time we started until we suspended. It was threatened on one or two occasions, but the minority considered they were also in the minority in every way, and succumbed. I remember very distinctly that I was in the midst of developing a certain state of facts in the cross-examination of Admiral Sims when this famous letter was injected. I was then submitting to the consideration of Admiral Sims a number of cases wherein the distinguished service medal was recommended by admirals in the Navy in cases where an officer had lost a ship.

I was doing it for the purpose of contradicting Admiral Sims's statement that it was contrary to the policy to grant any honor to an officer who lost his ship, for the purpose of disclosing the fact that it was not the policy of this Government to demote an officer, to take away from him his command, to place a stigma on him, when he lost his ship in the efficient performance of his duty without any fault on his part.

In the midst of the reading of those things the chairman stated: "The admiral has a letter that he would like to read." The Senator from Nevada said that he would prefer to go on with his own character of cross-examination, and the Senator insisted; and finally, under the belief which the Senator from Nevada had a right to indulge by reason of the statement of the Senator from Maine, the chairman of the committee, that this letter bore on the matter under consideration before us—in other words, the award of medals—I deferred my cross-examination to allow him to read the letter which was supposed to be in part answer to the character of cross-examination that I was conducting.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. PITTMAN. Just a second, please. When this letter was read, as it went on for nearly an hour, it was apparent that it did not answer the question. The Senator from Maine knew it was not answering the question. The Senator from Maine knew it was not dealing with the subject before the subcommittee. He was chairman of the subcommittee, and never once did he attempt to stop the reading of that letter or ask any questions with regard to the further contents of it—not one.

But after the admiral was through reading it, and the Senator from Nevada asked to go on with the cross-examination until 1 o'clock, there being 15 minutes left, then the Senator from Maine discovered that this letter had nothing to do with the matters submitted to the committee and was not within its jurisdiction, and that we ought to adjourn to get further information with regard to this letter. The Senator from Nevada said, "Let us go on with our examination of the matters that are within our jurisdiction until the hour of 1 o'clock." But that was not granted, and, by a motion supported by the three Republican members of the committee and opposed by the two Democratic members, they adjourned on us and stopped the proceedings.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield now.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator—and I do not want him to be offended by my request at all—if he will not let us go ahead with the bill that has been before the Senate so many days? The motion now is to try to supplant this bill with the resolution of the Senator from Maine. I can assure the Senator, I think, that that motion will be voted down if we let it come to a vote, or that the Senator from Maine will withdraw it and let us proceed with the bill which has been before the Senate so many days.

Mr. PITTMAN. I assure the Senator from Iowa that I have no desire to delay the consideration of his bill at all, but I want an opportunity at some time to speak with regard to the changed attitude of the Senator from Maine, and I want an opportunity to go into this whole subject of the appointment of counsel for committees which are composed of lawyers in the investigation of every little matter connected with any branch of this Government that somebody asks to be investigated; but I now will permit it to come to a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, in view of the fact that there is evidently more or less of a filibuster on this matter, I will withdraw my motion.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, of course if the Senator from Nevada is going to discuss the changing attitude of various Members of the Senate, it will take a long while.

Mr. BORAH. Especially on treaties.

Mr. KENYON. So I shall be glad if we can go ahead with the Americanization bill.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, it is a very fruitful subject; but I shall not do it, in deference to the Senator, while this bill is pending.

AMERICANIZATION OF ALIENS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3315) to promote Americanization by providing for cooperation with the several States in the education of non-English-speaking persons and the assimilation of foreign-born residents, and for other purposes.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I am under the impression that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] is going to speak upon this bill. If there are other Senators ready to go ahead I shall be glad if they will do so. If not, I will call for a quorum, and try to get the Senator from South Dakota here.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Colt	Frelinghuysen	Jones, Wash.
Ball	Culberson	Gronna	Kellogg
Borah	Dial	Hale	Kendrick
Brandegee	Edge	Harris	Kenyon
Calder	Fernald	Harrison	King
Capper	Fletcher	Hitchcock	Lenroot
Chamberlain	France	Johnson, Calif.	Lodge

McCumber	Overman	Simmons	Thomas
McKellar	Owen	Smith, Ga.	Trammell
McNary	Phelan	Smith, Md.	Underwood
Moses	Phipps	Smith, S. C.	Wadsworth
Nelson	Pittman	Smoot	Walsh, Mass.
New	Robinson	Spencer	Watson
Newberry	Sheppard	Sterling	Williams
Norris	Shields	Sutherland	Wolcott

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is detained from the Senate on official business.

Mr. KELLOGG. I wish to announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] are absent on the conference on the railroad bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Iowa has a number of amendments which he will tender in behalf of the committee; and until those amendments have been disposed of I shall not offer the one which I was about to suggest.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I have here a number of pro forma amendments.

On page 2, line 19, the word "board" is used. That is a mistake; and I move to strike out the word "board" and substitute therefor "the Secretary of the Interior."

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KENYON. On page 4, at the close of line 6, I offer the proviso which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 4, at the end of line 6, it is proposed to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That this shall not apply to those who are in this country temporarily for sojourn or business.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and myself have discussed the question of a reduction in the appropriation. I have not had an opportunity to discuss the matter with the members of the committee, but I understand that he will offer an amendment on that subject. I shall be glad if he will offer it now.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, in section 2, on page 2, line 6, I move to strike out all after the numerals "1920" to the end of that section and to insert the numeral "1" in place of the cipher, making it "1921" instead of "1920," and "$6,500,000" in place of the "$5,000,000," the intention being to make this apply only to the one year, and that that sum is all for the one year.

In section 3, on line 12, I move to strike out the words "for any fiscal year, $500,000," and insert "$100,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are they separate amendments, or one amendment?

Mr. WARREN. These are separate amendments, and I think the Secretary is taking them down as we go along.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry with respect to this amendment to which the Senator has directed attention?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WARREN. I yield.

Mr. KING. I understood the Senator to make the statement that the appropriation was for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921. What does the Senator do with the words found in lines 6 and 7, "and annually thereafter until the end of the fiscal year"?

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will notice, we strike out from that section all after the words "1920" and insert "$6,500,000" in place of "$12,500,000," and also strike out all relating to future years, making it apply only to 1921. We change "1920" to "1921."

Mr. KING. Then will it read "for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, $6,500,000"?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; and it ends right there.

Mr. KING. I am very glad that that amendment is made, because I think it is a very bad practice to make an appropriation in advance of one year.

Mr. WARREN. We can not permit that.

Now, Mr. President, on line 24 of the same page I move to strike out the words "for each fiscal year."

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WARREN. I do.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from Colorado suggests that the Senator offered an amendment there making that $500,000, $100,000.

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. I wish the Senator would not do that. That is $500,000 that is to be taken out of the $6,500,000, and it is very essential to have that a larger sum than the $100,000.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, as I view the situation, we have an entirely new problem before us in this bill. We have got to seek out ways and means. We have got to correspond with the States. This bill, with the ordinary procedure, will hardly get to be a law until some time late in the spring or perhaps toward the end of the present fiscal year. This $100,000 is to be used for a certain purpose, publications, and so on, but I wish to say to the Senator it will take a large part of the year 1921, in fact the whole year, before we will know how many States are going to accept this offer and how many are going to participate. I understand the bill provides that no State can get the benefits of the bill unless it appropriates $5,000 or more.

Mr. KENYON. No; it appropriates dollar for dollar, but there must be an appropriation of $5,000 as a minimum.

Mr. WARREN. That is what I say, it must appropriate dollar for dollar, but not less than $5,000. In other words, there can not be drawn from this fund more than $5,000 for any State unless the State puts up $5,000.

Mr. KENYON. No.

Mr. WARREN. When you come to take the number of States whose legislatures do not meet until a year from this winter, and it will be pretty well along toward the end of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, when they adjourn, you will see that this will hardly get fully organized during 1921. I think it would be wholly unnecessary to increase the total amount of $6,500,000. I doubt very much whether that can be used.

Mr. KENYON. We do not increase it by the $500,000. That is taken out.

Mr. WARREN. I understand.

Mr. KENYON. And none of it is taken for this year. It is all of it for next year, and that really seems to me the most important part of the bill.

Mr. WARREN. You mean the $100,000?

Mr. KENYON. The $500,000 is entirely for next year. I think the Senator has been under the impression that a part of it was to be used for this year. I think some of it should be used for this year.

Mr. WARREN. As I said, you will hardly get to the point where you can use it this year, because it is doubtful whether the bill will become a law before the end of the fiscal year. There are only five months more of the fiscal year remaining.

Mr. KENYON. That is why I have been willing, as far as I was concerned, to let it go for this year and to start in with next year. They may make the preparations and go ahead next year.

Mr. WARREN. I will say very frankly, Mr. President, that from conversations I have had with the Senator I have understood, perhaps erroneously, that the $100,000 was entirely satisfactory, and because of that I was willing to have the other $6,500,000.

Mr. KENYON. Then we must have misunderstood each other. The $100,000 I was talking about was the $100,000 for the balance of this year, and had nothing to do with next year. I felt that something should be appropriated for this year, and I feel so yet.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator could make this $100,000 applicable for this year.

Mr. KENYON. Then there would be practically nothing for next year. They can not organize this work and go ahead on $100,000. That, to my mind, is the most important part of the bill.

Mr. WARREN. What does the Senator propose to do with $6,500,000?

Mr. KENYON. The $6,500,000 goes entirely to the States.

Mr. WARREN. I do not so read it.

Mr. KENYON. There is no question about that. Out of the $6,500,000 there is taken the $500,000 under section 3. Then turn to section 4. The balance of the money goes to the States in proportion to the illiteracy. That is the whole theory of the bill. There is absolutely none of the $6,500,000, after you deduct the $500,000, that goes to anything but the distribution to the States.

Mr. WARREN. The distribution to the States, in my judgment, if the Senator sees fit to take $500,000 instead of $100,000, could well stand to have six million and a half as the total amount. There are plenty of funds in the $6,500,000 to cover the whole balance of this year and 1921, in my estimation.

Mr. KENYON. The $6,500,000 does it, but out of the $6,500,000 you take the $500,000 provided in section 3.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator want to take the $500,000 from the $6,500,000?

Mr. KENYON. Yes; that is it exactly. It does not increase it at all; and I think the Senator will remember that the $100,000 was for the balance of this year. But the Senator rather convinced me that it would be so late before the bill would be passed and signed that perhaps there would be no need of appropriating anything this year, and I am willing to agree to that.

Mr. WARREN. I am willing to make the amount $500,000 if that meets the wishes of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. And do nothing for this year?

Mr. WARREN. Then, where I designated $100,000, it may be made $500,000.

Mr. KENYON. I suggest to the Senator that on page 2, line 12, we strike out the words "for any fiscal year."

Mr. WARREN. I will ask the Secretary to state the first amendment.

Mr. KENYON. Would it not be better to take up the various amendments and dispose of them as we go along?

Mr. KING. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment when we reach section 30. So in disposing of the amendments suggested by the Senator from Wyoming I should be glad to have the amendment with regard to section 2 disposed of first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the first amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming.

The READING CLERK. In section 2, page 2, line 6, strike out the numerals "1920" and down to the end of the paragraph, including the word "year," in line 10, and insert "1921, $6,500,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall move to reconsider, unless the Senator from Iowa will agree that if my amendment to the next section should prevail, we may return to this item, because if it should prevail it might necessitate an amendment of this amount.

Mr. KENYON. If there is any need of returning to the section, I shall offer no objection to it, of course.

Mr. KING. That is the reason why I did not interpose an objection.

Mr. WARREN. I would like to have action upon so much of line 12 in section 3 as strikes out the words "for any fiscal year."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 2, line 12, strike out the words "for any fiscal year."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator wants to insist on that amendment. If the amendment is agreed to and the bill passes in that form, then all you have is an appropriation of $500,000.

Mr. KENYON. I think if that is so the Senator from Wyoming will not urge it.

Mr. WARREN. What did the Senator from Utah suggest?

Mr. SMOOT. I say that if the words "for any fiscal year" are stricken out, then the appropriation of $500,000, or whatever amount we provide, is all that will be appropriated for the expenses enumerated in section 3, and I take it for granted that the Senator from Iowa desires the appropriation for that purpose to cover each year hereafter that an appropriation may be made for the States.

Mr. WARREN. It is my intention absolutely to strike out of the bill any provision aimed to carry appropriations year after year in the future. That is, we appropriate for this purpose as we do for others, each year. We do not want by our legislation to mortgage the future, as to what shall be done hereafter.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly aware of that, Mr. President. If this amendment is adopted and no other amendment is added to section 3, it simply means that they can go to work and spend $500,000 between now and June 30 of the present year.

Mr. KENYON. No; it does not apply to that at all. Section 2 is for next year—1921.

Mr. SMOOT. Has that amendment been agreed to?

Mr. KENYON. That has been agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, then, that would make a difference in my conclusions in regard to section 3.

Mr. KENYON. I thought the Senator was wrong about it.

Mr. WARREN. I thought the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] had misunderstood.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming. On page 2, line 12, to strike out the words "for any fiscal year."

The amendment was agreed to.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment is, in section 4, on page 2, line 24, to strike out the words "for each fiscal year."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to section 3. Last evening, just before adjournment, the question came up as to making a lump-sum appropriation of $500,000 for the purposes named in section 3. I think there is not a Senator who does not desire in future to keep away from lump-sum appropriations. The Senator from Iowa asked the Commissioner of Education to submit to him an itemized statement as to the expenses that he had in mind to cover with the appropriation of $500,000, and the Senator has handed me the reply of the commissioner. While I have not had time to go into the details of it, in substance it is that of the $500,000 the sum of $158,500 is to be expended for salaries in the District of Columbia; that $79,800 is to be expended for salaries for the regional officers; for printing, stationery, and illustration material, $100,000; for traveling and subsistence, $55,000; for rent of regional offices, $6,000; for expert help in preparing material for teaching, $80,000; for 10 short-course training schools for supervisors and directors and those who will train teachers, $20,000; for incidentals and contingencies, $700; making a total of $500,000.

I think if the Senator from Iowa will study these estimates, he will agree that some of these items ought to be reduced.

Mr. KENYON. I will say to the Senator that the letter was handed to me just a few moments ago, and I have had no time to give it careful study.

Mr. SMOOT. Would it not be better to let it go over until we have time to study the items, and perhaps we can take it up later in the afternoon?

Mr. KENYON. Yes; I think that is a good idea. There is no reason why it can not be brought up as an amendment at any time.

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all, because the bill will be open to amendment as long as it is in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the chairman of the committee, I propose to offer as an amendment a proviso at the end of the section, and I invite attention to it now, so that it may be considered by the Senator from Utah and the chairman having the bill in charge in connection with the suggestion just made by my colleague. The proviso reads as follows:

Provided, That no part of said sum—

That is, the sum of $500,000, or whatever sum may be agreed upon, and I will say to the Senator that I have an amendment to reduce it to $250,000—shall be used to increase the compensation now provided for any position or office or person or official of said Interior Department or Bureau of Education: And provided further, That not more than $———

It was my purpose to put in $75,000 or $100,000, but I wanted to talk with the Senator from Iowa first—of said sum shall be expended in said year for the compensation or salaries of persons employed to carry out the provisions of this act, and for all expenses and costs of administration.

In other words, I desire to limit by this amendment the amount which may be used to a reasonable sum, and I say now that I think this amendment ought to be further amended by providing that there shall not be paid to any persons so employed a sum in excess of the amount now paid for like services in the various departments of the Government.

Mr. KENYON. As to the general plan the Senator proposes I have merely this suggestion to make: The Senator knows that it is better to have one good man at $10,000 a year, who can do the work, than 10 at $1,000, who can not do it. The trouble with that kind of a situation is that some men are worth so much more than others. I would be very glad to arrange with the Senator, and others who may be interested, for some kind of a limitation. I will talk with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] about it.

Mr. KING. I know the Senator from Iowa wants to practice economy in this bill, as well as in all other measures, and I am very anxious not to present a measure that does not commend itself to his judgment.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The READING CLERK. In section 5, page 3, beginning in line 23, strike out subdivision (e) and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(e) Require, under penalty, all resident persons, whether citizens of the United States or aliens, 16 years of age or over and under 21 years of age, who are not physically or mentally disqualified and who are illiterate or unable to understand, speak, read, or write the English language, to attend classes of instruction for not less than 200 hours per annum until they shall have completed a specified course prepared by the Department of Education or chief school officer of the State and approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I am in hearty sympathy with the purpose of this bill, and I think I understand clearly the necessity for a measure like this, to aid in the Americanization of a large foreign element. The Senator from Iowa, in his discussion of the bill, I think, has shown the need of such legislation.

I desire briefly to call attention to some statements made by Prof. Edward Alsworth Ross, now of the University of Wisconsin, formerly of the University of Nebraska, made in his work published in 1914, entitled "The Old World in the New." I do not mean, in reading these references to particular races, to cast any odium upon such races or their characteristics. I am reading what I believe to be statements of facts showing the conditions that confront America by reason of the immigration of certain alien elements.

Speaking of the Italians, Prof. Ross says, in discussing their social characteristics:

Migratory job hunters rather than homeseekers, the Italians are loath to encumber themselves with their women. The women are only a little more than one-fifth of the whole, nor do they come here more freely as time goes on. The natural consequence of leaving families behind is a huge return current to Italy, amounting to a third of the arrivals from Italy.

The following paragraph is significant:

More than half of our British immigrants are skilled. Of the Italian arrival 1 out of 8 is skilled, 1 out of 4 is a farm laborer, 1 out of 3 is a common laborer, and 1 in 250 has a profession. In a word, two-thirds are of rural origin. The illiteracy of the Italian immigrants more than 14 years of age is 47 per cent; so that of the 2,000,000 illiterates admitted to this country—1899–1909—nearly one-half hailed from Italy.

Further on in the work he says:

It was frequently stated to the members of the Immigration Commission in southern Italy that crime had greatly diminished in many communities because most of the criminals had gone to America. One Italian official at Messina stated that several years ago southern Italy was a hotbed of crime, but that now very few criminals were left. When asked as to their whereabouts, he replied, "Why, they are all in the United States."

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. That is interesting because the chart we had here the other day showed that from 1900 to 1915 the larger percentage, something over a million, had come from southern Italy.

Mr. STERLING. He proceeds:

From the Camorra, that vast spider web of thieves and prostitutes by whom life and politics in Naples are controlled, have come thousands who find the hard-working Italian immigrants a richer field of exploitation than any field open at home. Still more harassing is the Mafia, by means of which Sicilians contrive to ignore police and courts and to secure justice in their own way. A legacy of Spanish domination and Spanish arrogance is the sense of omerta, or manliness, which holds it dastardly to betray to justice even one's deadliest foe. To avenge one's wrongs oneself and never to appeal to law is a part of Sicilian honor.

Further, relative to the Italians, he says:

Among the foreign born the Italians rank lowest in adhesion to trade-unions, lowest in ability to speak English, lowest in proportion naturalized after 10 years' residence, lowest in proportion of children in school, and highest in proportion of children at work. Taking into account the innumerable "birds of passage" without family or future in this country, it would be safe to say that half, perhaps two-thirds, of our Italian immigrants are under America, not of it. Far from being borne along with our onward life, they drift round and round in a "Little Italy" eddy or lie motionless in some industrial pocket or crevice at the bottom of the national current.

I think, Mr. President, that one paragraph is pregnant with meaning and furnishes abundant evidences as to why legislation of this kind should be enacted.

I pass now to some observations made by Prof. Ross concerncerning the Slavic peoples.

Of the Slav arrivals since 1899 nearly three-fourths are males. Among the immigrants from the Balkans the men are from ten to twenty times as numerous as the women. Thirty-two per cent have been illiterates, the proportion ranging from 1.7 per cent among the Bohemians to 53.4 per cent among the Ruthenians. Excepting the Bohemians, few of them have had any industrial experience or bring any valuable skill. It is as if great numbers of the English of the sixteenth century had suddenly appeared among us.

It is a remarkable fact, Mr. President, that illiteracy is about, if not quite, as low among the Bohemians as among any other people on the face of the globe; I think it is even as low as, if not lower than, with the Scandinavian peoples, whose percentage of illiteracy is known to be very low.

What irony that these peasants, straight from oxgoad and furrow, should come to constitute, so far as we can judge from official figures, three-fifths of the force in sugar refining, two-fifths of the force in meat-packing, three-eights of the labor in tanneries and in oil refineries, one-third of the coal miners and of the iron and steel workers, one-fourth of the workers in carpet mills, and one-fifth of the hands in the clothing trade. On the other hand, they are but one-seventh of the labor force in the glass factories and in the cotton mills, one-ninth of the employees in copper mining and smelting (who are largely Finns), one-twelfth of our railway labor, and only a handful in the silk and woolen industries.

That is interesting and important, because it shows us in what occupations these people are engaged.

Here is another paragraph which shows the menace this immigration is to America and to American institutions. He says:

The Middle Ages are beginning to show among us—

That is, by reason of this vast immigration into this country of the people of this race we are being taken back, as it were, in our civilization to the period of the Middle Ages.

The Middle Ages are beginning to show among us. In 21 rural counties of Minnesota the Polish women have borne on an average 7 children in the course of 14½ years of married life. The full tale, no doubt, will come to 9 or 10. Thanks to our child-pitying, child-saving civilization, the Polish mother will keep her brood nearly as well as her American neighbor with 4 or 5. "The Irish for children," runs the proverb, and yet 1 Irish-American wife out of 13 is childless, and 1 English-American wife out of 12. But on the Minnesota farms only one Polish-American wife out of 58 is barren.

* * * * * * *

Eastern Europe is full of half-drowned nationalities, which only of late are regaining self-consciousness. Bohemians, Slovaks, Poles, Lithuanians, Serbians, and Bulgarians, each have had an "awakening," in which language revival and the study of national literature and history have played a great part. The immigrants who come with this quickened sense of nationality make it a point of honor not to drift selfishly with the American current and so lose touch with their struggling brethren in the old home. After refusing to be Germanized, Russified, or Magyarized in the old country, the patriotic Bohemian or Pole is bound to resist absorption here. It was the Irish-Americans who got the leverage for freeing Ireland. Now the Bohemians here are hoping to win home rule for Bohemia; while the Polish-Americans expect to find on this side of the water the fulcrum for the lever that shall free Poland. What, then, more natural than to cling to their own speech and traditions in home and church and parish school?

The vernacular press, of course—

Here is one element of danger; the condition here described was particularly noticeable in the German press and in the attitude and teachings of German societies before we entered the war.

The vernacular press, of course, harps ever on the chord of "the national speech," so that the second generation may not drift away to the reading of American newspapers. The church, too, which carries matters with a high hand among the Poles, holds the immigrants away from Americanization. The good priests fear lest some of their flock should turn away from religion, while the greedy priests dread lest the flock should become restless under priestly dictation.

So—

Says the author—

the tide from Slavland may swell, and the superfecund Slavs may push to the wall the Anglo-Americans, the Irish-Americans, the Welsh-Americans, the German-Americans, and the rest, until the invasion of our labor market by hordes of still cheaper West Asiatics shall cause the Slav, too, to lose interest in America, even as the Briton, the Hibernian, the Teuton, and the Scandinavian have lost interest in America.

Prof. Ross gives a vivid and yet I think in the main a true portrayal of conditions if we allow immigration to continue in the future as it has in the past and without our doing more than we have yet done toward the education of these people.

I come to the amendment just read. Subdivision (e) of the bill, it will be observed, provides for the compulsory education, in the first place, of all citizens of the United States between 16 and 21 years of age, but it requires the compulsory education of all aliens between 16 and 45 years of age resident in the United States. Mr. President, I can not quite reconcile my mind to that proposition. I believe the illiterates in America who are citizens of America and the illiterates from foreign lands who are here should in the matter of education be put exactly on the same basis. There is less excuse for the citizen of the United States to be uneducated and illiterate after he has reached the age of 21 years than there is for the foreign born. I see no reason why there should be the additional requirement against the foreign born, namely, that he should be compelled to attend school 200 hours each year after he has reached 21 years of age and until he has completed a specified course and the same rule not apply to the American citizen.

My amendment would strike out the maximum age of 45 years and provide that education should be compulsory for all illiterates, whether they are citizens or whether they are aliens, between the ages of 16 and 21. I think it will help us in the cause we are trying to promote to have the aliens and the citizens of the United States on an equality in this respect; that otherwise there might be great danger that resident aliens would resent the discrimination between citizens of the United States who were illiterate and their own illiterates, who have a much better excuse for being illiterate than our own people have.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PHIPPS in the chair). Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. May I ask the Senator if he proposes also a substitute for subdivision (f)?

Mr. STERLING. Yes; I had proposed a substitute for it.

Mr. KENYON. What is that substitute?

Mr. STERLING. The substitute for subdivision (f) leaves it practically the same as subdivision (f) now is, save that we shall—

Provide as far as possible, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, for the education of resident persons, whether citizens of the United States or aliens, of the age of 21 years or more and less than 50 years, who are illiterate or unable to speak, read, or write the English language.

In other words, that we shall provide, as far as possible, without making it compulsory and under a penalty, such as is provided for those in subdivision (e).

Mr. KENYON. The Senator makes it compulsory between 16 and 21 years of age?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. For aliens and citizens alike?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. And persuasive from 21 to 50, aliens and citizens to be treated alike?

Mr. STERLING. Yes. There is another consideration, and the Senator himself the other day in his able address called attention to it. That is the question of treaty and treaty obligations. I call attention to his statement, just briefly, at page 1848 of the RECORD of January 19, 1920, in which he says that he wrote the Secretary of State some time ago and sent him a copy of the bill, and asked if he thought it would violate any of our treaty obligations. The Senator placed that letter in the RECORD. Then the Senator from Iowa himself proceeds to say that he thinks there is a serious question as to whether there might not be a violation of the treaties with Switzerland and a few other nations.

I quote now from the treaty as set forth in the letter from the Secretary of State:

The citizens of the United States of America and the citizens of Switzerland shall be admitted and treated upon a footing of reciprocal equality in the two countries, where such admission and treatment shall not conflict with the constitutional or legal provisions, as well Federal as State and cantonal, of the contracting parties.

But further on it is provided:

No pecuniary or other more burdensome condition shall be imposed upon their residence or establishment, or upon the enjoyment of the above-mentioned rights, than shall be imposed upon citizens of the country where they reside, nor any condition whatever to which the latter shall not be subject.

Mr. President, surely, then, with reference to immigrants from Switzerland, we would be placing upon them burdens which we were not imposing upon our own citizens if we required them to attend school between the ages of 21 and 45.

Mr. KENYON. That, of course, is undoubtedly true if, under international construction, the school would be a burden. I am not certain, but I am very much inclined to think it would be. My thought, however, was that it possibly might be construed not to be a burden, and hence not to violate the treaty.

Mr. STERLING. The language is:

No pecuniary or other more burdensome condition shall be imposed upon their residence or establishment.

But the previous part of the treaty, that which I first read, which provides for treatment upon an equality, would, I think, reach it if the latter language does not. We would not be treating them as our own citizens are treated if we make their education compulsory between the ages of 21 and 45.

But, waiving the matter of treaty and treaty stipulations—and the Senator from Iowa thinks there may be other nations with which we have similar treaties—my judgment is that if we can hold out the inducement to them, saying, "We invite you—we urge you—to participate with us in this educational scheme of ours for the benefit of all residents of the United States, whether citizens or aliens," we will have their cooperation instead of incurring the danger of having their resentment if we impose conditions upon them which we do not impose upon our own people. I believe that this is as far as we should go. We are taking a great stride in this direction when we are making compulsory education between the ages of 16 and 21 years.

I have some authority here, in a statute passed in my own State in 1919, providing for compulsory education. It makes education of illiterates compulsory between the ages of 16 and 21 years, but it stops there, and then provides some such plan as is provided in subdivision (f), making it in effect voluntary after the age of 21. It is only "so far as possible" that education shall be provided for those between the ages of 21 and 50 years. After providing for the compulsory education of all illiterates between 16 and 21, the South Dakota statute further provides:

Provided, That any person or persons more than 21 years of age and less than 50 who do not possess the ability to read, write, and speak the English language equivalent to the requirements for the fifth grade in our State course of study for the common schools may attend during good behavior, free of charge, any of the special classes established under the provisions of this act.

Subdivision (f) of this bill, and as I have provided in a substitute for this subdivision, goes further than the South Dakota statute and requires that the State "provide as far as possible * * * for the education" of resident citizens and aliens. I may say that my State of South Dakota since 1907 has had a compulsory-education law requiring the attendance upon schools of all between the ages of 8 and 16 years.

Mr. President, I can not help but think we will be doing the wise thing, the prudent thing, and the one that as much as anything else will appeal to and invite the cooperation of the alien element in this country, if we limit the compulsory provisions of the act to the ages between 16 and 21 for citizens and aliens alike; and I assure the Senator from Iowa that it is in the interest of the bill itself, of the general scheme and purpose of the bill, that I have proposed this amendment.

I call attention to another respect in which I amend, by this substitution, subdivision (e). I insert the words "who are not physically or mentally disqualified."

Mr. KENYON. That amendment should be made. I had intended to offer an amendment of that kind.

Mr. STERLING. Then, Mr. President, another thought that I have had all along is that in these educational schemes, where cooperation is sought between the Federal Government and the State governments, the initiative should clearly be with the States, who know the population, the various foreign elements in it, and who know conditions better than can the Federal authorities here in Washington. So I have provided in the bill that the specified course of study should be prepared by the department of education or chief school officer of the State, and approved by the Secretary of the Interior. I do not know but this would follow from subsequent language of the bill, but I want to make it clear that this course shall be first marked out and prepared by the State authorities.

I think, Mr. President, that covers the points of this first amendment which I have offered, and covers my thought, too, in regard to the general purpose of the bill, which I heartily favor.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I listened very attentively indeed to the able and exhaustive address of the chairman of this committee, and I must say that he almost convinced me that it was our duty to pass this bill; but, on reflection, I am satisfied that this is not a matter upon which Congress should legislate. It is ideal, of course, for people to be educated, and I hope the time will soon come when every person over 10 years old in the United States can read and write; but that is a question that pertains peculiarly to the States.

When I went over on the other side of the Chamber and looked at the chart that the chairman had prepared, and saw the position that my State occupied, I certainly felt very reluctant to oppose any appropriation for this purpose, and I did not get much comfort from that chart, except I am thankful that three States have a greater proportion of illiteracy than South Carolina. That is not very much consolation, but it helps.

Mr. President, this war has revealed to us many things. It has shown us the great percentage of illiteracy in the United States. I was startled when I read the figures.

Some time ago a little incident occurred in my town that touched the hearts of all who heard it. We have a negro educator in my State, and he is one who preaches the right doctrine to his own race. He not only preaches it, but in my opinion he practices it. He made a speech in my town to the negroes and also to the white people, who sometimes turn out to hear him, and he said that a short time before that he was in a depot waiting for a train and a white soldier told him he wanted to see him. He took him around to the side of the depot and pulled a letter out of his pocket, and said he had been carrying it for three days, and he could neither read nor write, and he asked this negro preacher to read it for him. It was a letter from the soldier's mother. The preacher read it to him, and he asked the preacher to write a letter for him to his mother, which the preacher did.

The white boy insisted on paying him for it, but the preacher would not accept any money. The boy, however, insisted on his taking a dollar, and he said he did not want to offend him, so he took the dollar; and the meeting where he made this speech was to collect money for some war activity, and he contributed a dollar, and no doubt more besides.

When we remember that our soldiers went to the war when many of them could not read their orders, and could not read the letters that they received from their mothers and from home, it certainly does show that we ought to make a great effort to educate our people sufficiently to enable them to read and write. Incidents of that kind brought to our attention forcibly the condition that we are in, and I believe that the States of this Union have gone to work and are going to put forth renewed efforts whereby they will obliterate illiteracy all over this country. I know that in my State we now have an organization of teachers that go around to the different counties, a kind of a flying organization of four or five teachers, and they organize adult schools. I noticed in the paper yesterday that they went to a town that is a good-sized town, with two large cotton mills in it, and they had inaugurated a school in each, and in a very short time, two or three months, there was not an adult, I believe, with the exception of two, but that could write his own name. I have seen some letters that some of those adult pupils wrote to the principals. So our State is making a great effort to throw off this cloud of illiteracy, and I think by the time another census is taken we will be able to take a higher stand on the chairman's chart over there. We will not be so near the bottom as we are now. I am informed that this is also being done in my neighboring State of Georgia and in a number of other States.

But, Mr. President, it takes more than education to make good citizens. Sometimes a little knowledge gets people into trouble. I noticed in the paper just a day or two ago where a forgery was committed down in my town on a little bank of which I am president, and the culprit is now in jail, and I want to go home next week and put him on the chain gang. So people not only ought to be taught to read and write, but they ought to be taught right principles; they ought to be taught honesty and industry and decency; they ought to be taught to work; and I am sorry to say that when people get educated in these modern times they seem to think, often, that means that they should quit work. If this bill or any other bill is passed about education, I hope we will try to convince the people that it is not disreputable to earn their living by the sweat of their brow.

Mr. President, while, as I say, it is very desirable to educate all of our people, we have compulsory-education laws in a great many of the States; we have in my State, I know; but the ages would not come within the limits of this bill. Therefore you would have to amend the laws of the different States in order to compel people to attend school. Not only that, Mr. President, but at this particular time, directly after the Great War, when the country is in such an unsettled condition, and when labor is so scarce and production so limited, it does seem to me that we should be content to wait a little while longer before initiating any new expenditures under this Government.

Arguments were made by Senators yesterday about the constitutionality of this proposed law. I had often thought that there was no provision in the Constitution whereby the National Government could undertake to educate the people, but I believe we have stretched the Constitution to cover pretty much everything that the people want; so yesterday, when Senators were undertaking to differentiate and to explain how this bill would or would not come under the general-welfare clause, I thought that if they could not bring it under that clause perhaps they could get it under the interstate-commerce clause. I believe if they do not get it under one they will put it under the other. I do not want to prejudge their argument, but I thought perhaps it would be something like this—that it was against the interests of interstate commerce for an illiterate man to ride, and therefore Congress should appropriate money to educate him, so that he could ride better. [Laughter.]

I do not know whether you could get inside the Constitution along that line or not, Mr. President; but it does seem to me, in all seriousness, that it is time for Congress to go back to original principles, and that we should call a halt on all but the most necessary expenditures.

As I suggested yesterday, take, for instance, the railroads of this country. When the managers of one-twelfth of the taxable property of this country, one class of property that ought to be a prosperous class, admit that they can not operate at a profit on the present basis, and when they admit that they can not pay taxes, and when they fall down by the roadside and ask for help, does it not warn us that other enterprises will soon be in the same condition? It is becoming burdensome on all the enterprises in this country. Now, if the railroads fall down, perhaps the next thing the factories will say that they can not exist under the present high-priced labor, high taxes, high-priced materials, and everything of that sort; so it looks to me as though disaster were ahead. Our annual interest bill to-day exceeds, I am told, the entire national debt as it stood in 1914!

If I may be excused for making a personal allusion, I will say this: I think I have about as much nerve as the ordinary man. It has been my pleasure to promote various enterprises in my part of the country. I have put a little money in them myself—not much, for I did not have much to put in—but I have induced my friends from all over the country, from North and South, to develop enterprises and to give employment to a number of people, quite a number of people; and it has been one of the prides of my life that those enterprises have succeeded, and are succeeding to-day, and no one has ever lost a dollar in any enterprise that I have gotten anybody to put any money into. Now, Mr. President, I ask to be excused for referring to myself, but I do it for this purpose: The people of the United States, as a rule, are constituted pretty much alike. As I say, I think I have as much nerve as the ordinary man, and I would no more undertake to-day to induce my friends to start a new enterprise, on account of the uncertainties of taxation, and the great unrest in this country, and the turmoil that now exists, than I would undertake to jump out of the window of a seven-story building; and if I feel that way, is it not natural to believe that other people would feel that way, Mr. President?

We want to do something in this country to encourage investment, to encourage industry, and to encourage enterprise. You take the man on the farm: If taxes and labor and materials and other things are going to get so high, and his profits are going to become so little, remember that whenever he stops his plow and moves to town he brings in five or six people to sit around a table and eat and to compete with us who do not produce. Therefore, we ought to do nothing to increase taxes in this country, but everything to encourage industry and more production on the farms. We never will get the cost of living down until we do produce more. We should realize that every man should work. It is ideal to have education, but you want him to have more than education. He should devote that education to enable him to produce more and to become a better citizen.

I say, then, that we have aroused the States. They fully realize the conditions that exist, and I think each State now is going to see if it can not surpass the others in obliterating illiteracy. There is no compelling reason for the intervention of the National Government; on the other hand, there are many and weighty objections to such interference.

Then we must remember that before this war there were only about 400,000 bondholders in the United States, and we went to work to sell Government bonds, and no doubt every Senator here made speeches to encourage the people to buy bonds. I talked until I was hoarse all over my county and my State. I told them that I not only believed the Government bond was a good investment, but it was the best investment that they could make, and I told them I believed those bonds would not only bring par, but within a reasonable time they would bring a premium. I told them that after the Civil War my recollection was that bonds of the United States Government brought a premium of as much as $36 on the hundred, and I believed that these bonds in a short space of time would go up.

Now we see what is going on. Instead of being able to get out without a loss, they are now down as low as perhaps 91 or 92, or something like that, depending on the different issues of bonds. I feel that it is our bounden duty to stop every expenditure that we possibly can, to lop off every expense possible in this Government, and to encourage the people who hold those bonds, and try to get them back to 100 cents on the dollar at as early a date as possible. I hate to see my Government's paper sell under par. I would hate to see my own paper sell under par. I hope it will not be long until there will be such a demand for those bonds that they will bring 100 cents on the dollar. Now, if we keep on appropriating money here as we have been doing, it seems to me that we are absolutely unmindful of the interests of the people.

I believe another bill is pending here, perhaps, to appropriate $100,000,000 for education. These figures are startling; in fact, almost beyond comprehension. Of course, it takes money to operate this Government, and we are compelled to have a certain amount of taxes, but the people of this country are tired of being overburdened, and they are looking closer to their representatives than they have ever looked in the past, to see that we do our duty.

I might say, not in the nature of a threat to my southern brethren, that a long time after the Civil War we hardly considered that we were in this Union; we did not get much out of it, and we did not pay very much attention to it. We did not pay much taxes, except a little tariff. But now, since everyone almost has to pay an income tax, and since our factories and our banks and our other enterprises are paying high taxes, the people are watching the votes of their representatives in Washington more closely than they watched them in the past. So I believe, Mr. President, that it should be the policy of this Congress to appropriate just so much money as is required to preserve the Government, to protect the credit of the Government, and to furnish what is necessary, but not to expend more and to encourage people to extravagance.

A lot of money is appropriated under this bill for a periodical or something of that sort. The great trouble with those things is that these periodicals do not get into the families they ought to reach. Those of us who do get the mail get a lot of this trash and throw it in the wastebasket. But I hope by educating the people you will get them to take newspapers and to take magazines and to read them. But I do not know that I care for the kind of periodicals that are to be gotten out under this bill and to be sent around through the country.

We have appropriated money here for vocational education of discharged soldiers and sailors. It is very proper to get these men back on their feet. That is to be expected. But I do not think a good many of these things are expected from Congress.

So I feel, Mr. President, that it is my duty to my people to say this, that we do not want this money appropriated; that we want the head of the family to take an interest in his family and to control his children; and I feel that this burden should not be removed from the family onto the Government.

After awhile the States will come to Washington for everything. They come for almost everything now. As I said some time ago, if we keep on assuming jurisdiction here in Washington the governors of the States will be not much more than chiefs of police. That is about what they are now, in fact. So I feel, Mr. President, that the time has come when we should examine ourselves, and I can not see how men can come here and be unmindful of the interests of their constituents.

Things are becoming burdensome; and if you discourage a man and induce him to quit work, then he becomes a drone on society. I want to raise up an independent population in this country, and not a dependent crowd who think that they can not get along without running to the Government and asking for a little pap every time they need a little something or other. The communities ought to be ashamed not to go ahead and educate the people there. Down in my country we know almost everyone by his given name, and the war has taught us to take a brotherly interest in our fellow men, and that is what we are doing, and we are doing it rapidly, and we are going to encourage them to get an education and to better their condition. But I feel that it would be a sad day if we should give up our home schools and our interest in them. This money would not amount to much, anyway, when spread through the Union, and I feel it is a bad principle, and I think it is now time to stop and strike out any other appropriations along this line.

While I was almost persuaded by the eloquence of the chairman of the committee, I feel that his bill is based on a wrong principle and ought not to pass.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, from the very best information I can obtain, we will start our fiscal year beginning on July 1, 1920, with about $3,000,000,000 deficit. We have estimates for the fiscal year 1921 amounting to about $6,000,000,000. That brings the total up to $9,000,000,000. The same Book of Estimates will show that we will possibly raise during the fiscal year 1921 about $6,000,000,000. That will leave us at the end of that year with $3,000,000,000 of indebtedness. How are we going to meet it? In one of two ways: Either by cutting down appropriations to keep them within the income, or by issuing bonds and increasing our national interest-bearing debt. We are up against that proposition at the present time.

It was my intention to discuss that feature of the situation in connection with the bill which is now pending. The bill, however, has been pending for some time, and I know the Senator from Iowa is anxious to dispose of it this afternoon. I am quite equally certain that anything I would say would not change a vote upon the bill. So I give notice at this time that to-morrow morning, after the close of the routine morning business, I shall ask permission of the Senate to present some facts and figures along this line, and to indicate, and my remarks will only be valuable if I can indicate, wherein we can make a saving to keep our expenses within our income.

I only want to say at this time that I shall vote against the pending bill. There may be considerable merit in the bill itself, but I shall vote against each and every bill that will add to the expenses of the Government which shall be presented at this session of Congress, until I can see daylight between our expenses and our income.

I object to this bill for another reason. I know of no moral obligation, at least, on the part of the United States to educate the Russian people, or the Italian people, or any other European people. Above all, I am not in favor of spending money to educate them when we have to borrow the money with which to do it.

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] just quoted extracts from a book written by Prof. Ross. I think the Senator could draw a conclusion entirely different from that which he did draw from those excerpts. My own conclusion is, applying my own views, that you can not Americanize anyone by simply educating him. You can not change a criminal into a good man by simply teaching him how to read and write English. On the contrary, I am rather inclined to think that the greater education you give to a criminal the greater opportunity there is on his part for the practice of his criminal vices. I am not sure that an education of a Trotski or a Lenin, or that character of people in the United States, has benefited the Russian people to any great extent, and I do not think that we help out the situation by attempting to educate them here.

The Senator's quotation indicated that about one-third of the Italians return to their own country each year. I do not know how many of them come back the second year. But I am certain that if they or any percentage of the number he has spoken of are of the character indicated in these lines from Prof. Ross, we do not want to Americanize them. We do not want them as American citizens.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I would do what I could to keep them from being naturalized, and when you decline to naturalize them, you are in a position to send them back to the country from which they emigrated. When you Americanize them and naturalize them, you have to take care of them here in some way. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. STERLING. I should like to ask the Senator if he would prevent their immigration to this country?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly I would.

Mr. STERLING. That is another question, then.

Mr. McCUMBER. The criminal class, and those I could not catch in a net at Castle Garden and send back, those that got through the meshes and who we found were criminals here, I certainly would not try to educate and thereby increase their ability to commit crime. On the contrary, instead of educating them, I would try to get them back to their own country as quickly as possible.

I know, Mr. President, that there is not much use of talking against any of these provisions. We have gone mad on the question of conceiving new things that will reach into the Federal Treasury. Nothing that anyone can say at this time is going to stop that tendency. There is just one thing that will stop it, and that is our coming to the end of the rope. When we have to bond the country for an extra sum of money, then the people themselves will see that we stop these unnecessary appropriations.

I admit that there is some good in this bill. I do not doubt that. There are a thousand good things that we can not afford to appropriate for at this time, under the present conditions of the United States Treasury.

So, Mr. President, I am going to vote against this bill, and against each and every bill calling for appropriations, except those that appropriate what is absolutely necessary for the existence and the functioning of the Government.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, in view of the situation in the country at the present time in regard to the activities of alien radicals, undoubtedly the question of a Federal educational bill, looking to the compulsory education of aliens and illiterates, will appeal to many of those in the country who believe that the basis of good citizenship is education. I have no desire to interfere with the policy of the Senator from Iowa, who has fathered so many constructive measures in this body. I know that his great, broad spirit and conception of the welfare of the country is reflected in the social legislation which he now proposes. But there are two reasons why I shall vote against this bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry right there?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Certainly.

Mr. KING. It may be an additional reason, if I interpreted the opening sentence of the Senator correctly. As I understood the Senator, he conceives the bill to deal only with the education of illiterate aliens. Does not the Senator understand that the bill goes further, and that it devolves upon the Federal Government the duty of providing for the education of illiterates who are American citizens, a duty which should devolve upon the States?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes; I understand that; I have read the bill.

Mr. KING. Then I apologize to the Senator for interrupting him.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I was referring particularly to the sentiment of the country toward the Americanization of those elements which are opposed to our institutions of government.

I have made no preparation on this bill. I am simply speaking from my own experience, as one who is interested very largely in the educational affairs in my own State. I believe that we are departing from our powers of government when we are undertaking as a Nation to establish a Federal system of education. I admit that these figures presented by the Senator from Iowa are very startling, particularly those pertaining to my own State, which show 13 per cent of illiterates over 10 years of age. The figures showing the percentages in other States are also startling. The figures also were startling which came to us when the draft was imposed, when it was necessary for the military authorities to establish educational facilities in the various camps and military communities of the country.

But the States at the present time are undertaking the education of their illiterates. Large sums of money are being appropriated in my State and in New York State, and I believe that it is the function of the State and not the function of the Federal Government to carry on the educational systems of this country.

I wrote to one of the members of the State board of education of my State in regard to this measure. I said to him that I was very much impressed with the efforts made by the Senator from Iowa to improve the situation, particularly after he had been a member of a committee to investigate the causes of a large strike in this country, where he found large communities and large centers where the English language was not spoken; and I told him that I thought some good might come from this measure. This man is a student of the educational systems of this country.

I believe that he knows as much as any other educator in the country. He is a member of the State board of education at the present time. He had a great deal to do with helping me draft the educational laws of New Jersey, which have raised the standard of education in that State to the forefront of all the States in the Union. He has written me a letter on this subject, and I am going to read it for the information of the Senate, withholding his name. I will furnish his name confidentially to any of the members of the committee or to Members of the Senate. It reflects, since I have considered this question further, my views, because I believe that he is right. His letter reads:

Since receipt of your letter of the 9th I have read the Kenyon bill, S. 3315. It is merely one phase of the bill introduced at the last few sessions for the creation of a department of education and providing an appropriation of $100,000,000. There was opposition to that bill, and I rather assume, in view of that opposition, that this bill is simply an entering wedge and introduced in the expectation that very few will dare oppose it because of the application to it of the term "Americanization." To me Americanization means love of country. Love, in my mind, can not be taught. It is something that must be imbibed or grow upon a person. A child is not taught to love its parents, neither is a husband taught to love his wife. Many parties marry in the expectation that love will come after the marriage, but experience shows that there is no more foolish way to enter into wedlock. An Irishman is not taught to hate England; a Russian is not taught to hate England; a Frenchman is not taught to hate Germany. Such a hatred is imbibed with the mother's milk. Many of the Russians who came to this country came because of their hatred of the autocratic government under which they were born. Very many of them hate any government. To them government is obnoxious. The more you teach them the more dangerous they become. You will not Americanize them—you will make them dangerous enemies of all governments. The mere fact that a man is taught to read, write, and understand English will not Americanize him. An Englishman who comes to this country thoroughly understands the language, but he does not become Americanized—he remains an Englishman. That is a notorious fact. Very few Frenchmen who come to this country, no matter how well they know English, become Americanized—they remain Frenchmen. Anarchists who come to this country do not become Americanized—they remain anarchists, and present experience is demonstrating that fact. Educate them and they become just so much the more dangerous. The phrase "Americanization," therefore, does not appeal to me in the bill. Very many who have studied the subject do not believe that Americanization can be taught. Many have reached the conclusion that it is through singing and possibly through motion pictures that love of country will gradually grow upon people. The bill should therefore be considered on its merits and quite aside from the glamor of the word "Americanization."

Take section 3. Five hundred thousand dollars may be used for the publication of periodicals devoted to Americanization problems and for aiding work carried on by local bodies, private individuals, and organizations for studies and reports through the Bureau of Education, etc. A nice item for patronage and also perhaps for propaganda in favor of those in power.

Under section 5, subdivision (e), course of study must be approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

Under subdivision (h) the Secretary of the Interior can insist upon a report to his satisfaction.

Under section 11 he can make rules and regulations.

By section 6 it is provided that none of the appropriations under the bill can be used for the education of persons under 16—

I understand that has been amended, has it not?

Mr. KENYON. No; it has not.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The letter continues—or for purposes other than those which I have designated above as patronage and propaganda, but may be used for "payment of salaries of teachers, supervisors, or directors of education, or for the preparation of teachers, supervisors, and directors of education." Now, you can see who is behind the bill and one of its main objects. The school people think that through the United States Government they will be able to get better salaries and also believe that if a department of education is ultimately created they will become a greater factor. The real object of this bill, I believe, is an entering wedge for a department of education. If the United States Government controls the purse strings and can make rules and regulations governing the disbursement of school moneys and can insist upon courses of study, it will, just as sure as I am writing, enter into the field of education and control same. The United States Government has no right under the Constitution to enter the field of education. It is admitted that that is outside of its powers. If education is outside of its powers, what right has it to tax for purposes of education? If can not distribute the money unless it secures same through taxation. I maintain that the United States has no more right to tax for an extra constitutional power than it has to exercise an extra constitutional power. The whole thing goes back to my fundamental proposition that we have been drifting very rapidly away from the form of government established by Washington, Jefferson, Hamilton, and others. Washington is grasping for power; the President is grasping for power; it is very nearly time for some one to insist that this is a Republic made up of independent States; that the States reserved certain powers and that the Federal Government should not, directly or indirectly, assume such powers.

Mr. President, those are the views of a very able man——

Mr. STERLING. Will the Senator state, while he does not give his name, what is his profession or occupation?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. He has been a member of the State board of education in New Jersey for, I think, six or eight years; he is a lawyer; he is a prominent citizen of my State; and I think he knows not only the school laws of our own State, but of every other State in the Union.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NUGENT in the chair). Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Certainly.

Mr. KING. The letter which the Senator has just read expresses views which meet with my hearty approval and presents, I think, an irrefutable argument in favor of the conclusions drawn. But what I rose to say was that the statement made by the writer, namely, that the bill is intended as an entering wedge to further appropriations from the Treasury of the Federal Government for education in the States, is correct. Secretary Lane testified recently before one of the committees—I think a committee of the Senate—that the Smith-Towner bill, which is the bill to appropriate $100,000,000 annually and creating a department of education, is not to be put aside by this bill; in other words, that this is merely a prelude to that.

Mr. Claxton, in the propaganda which he is carrying on throughout the United States, calls attention to the fact that the bill known as the Smith-Towner bill, creating a department of education, is not to be superseded by this bill but that this is to pave the way. That is the substance of the letter. The other bill is a more formidable and far more objectionable measure.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I have read the views of this gentleman, who has made a study of the question, and I simply wish to say that I believe that if you will let this thing alone, leave it to the States themselves, the legislature of every State in the Union is alive to the problem and that they will meet it. New Jersey is very differently situated from many other States in the Union, especially many of the Western States. It absorbs large numbers of the immigrants coming to the country. We have a great collection of racial groups in our various cities in New Jersey, but I desire to say that the record we have shown in the war and the record of their support of the Government in the war is one of which our State is very proud.

The State itself has appropriated large sums of money, I think about $12,000,000 a year, for the cause of education. We are taking care of these problems in New Jersey, and we will continue to take care of them.

Education will not remove from the mind of the anarchist or the communist or the Bolshevist his hatred for government. I venture to say that every one of the radicals deported in the "red ark" was a man of education. Did it prevent them from plotting against the welfare and safety of this Government? Not a bit of it.

We have gone on with a sort of reckless indifference to the practical question of our governmental expenditures in these great uplift measures that have been presented to the Senate. There was no question about the duty of the Government to pass the vocational bill for the rehabilitation of wounded soldiers; there was no question about their vocational training up to a certain limit; but there is a question when we are asking the States of the Union, through this new source of revenue which within the past five years has been afforded, the application by the Federal Government of the excess-profits tax, to take away from certain States through that system of taxation and reappropriate to other States that do not bear as great a share of the burden of that taxation.

I will refer, in illustration, to the good-roads act, which appropriated some $250,000,000. There are three States in the Union—New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey—that pay, if I remember the figures correctly, about $141,000,000 of that tax through the income and excess-profits tax appropriated in that manner; and yet some of the Western States receive back four and five times the amount that they pay through that same source. The same thing applies to this appropriation of $12,500,000 devoted to this purpose, looking to the establishment of a control and supervision of education in the Federal Government. That is what I object to.

The standards of efficiency in New Jersey are at the highest mark; but if you are going to bring political influence into the school system of New Jersey, those standards will be lowered to zero, and that is a proposition you can not get away from.

I have been told that already efforts are being made by an influential politician to procure positions through the vocational board for favorites. I care not whether my own party is in power or whether the party represented by the minority on the other side now controlling the administration is in power, you can not, if you centralize in the Federal Government the control and supervision of education, prevent politics creeping in; and politics means, in my opinion, the breaking down of the educational system of the country.

Mr. President, I have spoken of only one phase of the bill. I have simply given my own personal views and impressions in regard to it. I shall vote against it. I shall also vote against any bill to Federalize the educational system of the country.

There is another feature of the bill that imposes a burden upon the Treasury for all years to come; a burden of $12,500,000 annually. Am I correct in that?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator is mistaken about that. The original bill as introduced by the Senator from Iowa limited it, I think, to three years; and I think he then reduced the appropriation to $6,500,000.

Mr. KENYON. I did not understand the Senator's inquiry.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from New Jersey has just stated that the bill makes the appropriation continuous. I was endeavoring to explain that to him.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am now told that it is $6,500,000.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I understand it is claimed that this is only an emergency bill, and that it is to be followed by a bill which will appropriate $100,000,000 a year.

Mr. KENYON. I do not know of any claim of that kind.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will state for the Senator's information that on yesterday I had a copy of a letter from Mr. Claxton, written to different people of the country, wherein he said it was not intended by this bill to displace a bill which is to come later, which is called the Smith-Towner bill.

Mr. KENYON. The Smith-Towner bill is pending before the committee, but it has nothing to do with this bill. I think it will be some time later when it reaches the Senate.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Whether it is $6,500,000 or $12,000,000, when you come to educate the population represented in the charts presented by the Senator from Iowa, in my opinion $6,500,000 will not scratch the surface. I only speak from recollection, but I believe that the Vocational Educational Department is asking for increased appropriations. To assume that you can give any sort of education to those illiterates represented in the charts referred to with $6,500,000 is, I think, beyond the range of human imagination. You can rely on it that if the system is entered into and this Federal bureau is established, whether a separate bureau is established or it is administered through some other bureau, it will cost a great deal more than $6,500,000 a year. But even that is a considerable sum at the present time.

For eight years we have indulged in this country in a saturnalia of extravagance. I do not blame either political party. I blame the Committee on Appropriations and I blame the lack of vision on the part of statesmen who have gone before who have not established an efficient budget system in the country. Before the war there was a time when we ran the Government on $1,000,000,000 a year. Then it rose, immediately before the war, to $2,000,000,000. During the war there was greater extravagance than that practiced by any other nation characterizing our expenditures. This, in a large measure, was probably necessary by reason of our lack of preparation, by reason of the necessary haste owing to the breakdown in the morale of the armies on the other side, and the fact that we were 3,000 miles away from the scene of action. Nevertheless, there was great extravagance.

Since the war, when everything should have counseled economy, there has been nothing but waste, waste, waste! We have heard of these great war munitions and materials of war, the automobiles parked by the thousand, rusting, useless, still parked in those large concentration centers, no effort made to sell them, and yet a bill comes before the Congress and is passed allocating those transportation motors to the Highway Commission and the Post Office Department without any estimate as to their needs, not knowing whether they need 1,000 or the 36,000 that were allocated, and no inquiry made as to the necessity of that distribution.

We have the report of the selling of $1,700,000,000 worth of war materials in Europe for $750,000,000. Of course, everyone knows that a lot of those permanent structures and improvements after the war were much depreciated in value; everyone recognizes that; but if you will investigate the hearings before the House committee, you will find that there were millions of pounds of sugar, millions of pounds of coffee, and millions of pounds of bacon sold for 20 cents on the dollar reflected in the comparison of values between the cost and the prices for which they were sold. There were 74,000,000 pounds of bacon, if I remember it correctly, that sold for 11 cents a pound figured in that proportion, and the French Government turned around and sold it immediately to the people for 18 cents a pound. Now, I simply point out that when this country needed the food, when there was a shortage of sugar, when the high cost of living was burdening everybody in this country, the War Department was selling its war materials over there for about 25 cents on the dollar—shoes, clothing, thousands of articles that could have been utilized in this country had they been transported.

During the last few months we have increased the pay of the firemen, we have increased the pay of the policemen, we have increased the wages of the miners, we have increased the wages of the shopmen on the railroads, and the trainmen. This represents nearly a billion dollars loaded on the cost of commodities when the war is over, and economy should be the watchword.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield.

Mr. KING. I rise for information. The Senator has made a statement in regard to the disposition of surplus products held by the War Department in France. I have heard that statement made a number of times, and have seen it in the newspapers. I was wondering whether, assuming that the statements are true, the fault is chargeable to Gen. Pershing, or to Secretary Baker, or to Assistant Secretary Crowell, or to some other official, or to a board? Has any evidence been adduced before the committee, of which the Senator is a member, that would indicate who was chargeable for that negligence and delinquency, if there is negligence and delinquency?

Mr. WILLIAMS. What has all that got to do with this bill?

Mr. KING. The Senator asks what that has to do with this bill. I think that in the discussion of appropriations the Senator from New Jersey is perfectly within the legitimate sphere of discussion in calling attention to the great expenses of the Government.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Possibly the Senator from Mississippi failed to hear my protest against this bill on the ground that at the present time we could not afford it; and I was calling attention to the policy of this Congress in appropriating money for many projects, and also the absolute disregard at the present time of any policy of economy in the Government; and I think it is perfectly pertinent to the position I have taken on this subject that I should make some mention of the question of economy.

Answering the Senator from Utah, I will state that the information I have procured comes from the hearings of the House Committee on War Expenditures, which I read. I shall be very glad to furnish them for the information of the Senator, and I think he will see that the testimony given there proves that my statements are accurate.

The Senator asked who was responsible for that apparent discrimination between the cost price and the selling price of these war materials. I do not know who is directly responsible, but the Senator may be interested if he reads the hearings and ascertains that there was a board over there, but the policy of that board was controlled from Washington; and he will also find, I think, certain official telegrams empowering that board not only to sell these food supplies in Europe at that price, but also calling attention to the fact that there were many millions of dollars worth of food supplies in this country which would be available on the same terms, through the same commission, for distribution in France. If my memory serves me right, I think there was 57,000,000 pounds of sugar mentioned in that list, which finally resulted in a resolution in the House of Representatives directing the War Department to distribute those food materials to the people of this country.

I hope I have answered the Senator. I shall be very glad to give him official copies of those hearings.

I simply wish to refer to a statement by Secretary Glass, of the Treasury Department, regarding the appropriations by Congress, and pointing out the fact that if Congress does not stop these indiscriminate appropriations for every project under the sun we will be compelled to impose upon the people of this country another bond issue; and I want to say that after reading this wonderful statement made by the Secretary of the Treasury before the Budget Committee in the House, I am glad that a man of such character and ability and courage is going to become a Member of this body.

In the course of this statement he says:

All sense of values seems to have departed from among us. The departments, bureaus, and boards, all inspired by a laudable enthusiasm for their work, but some by a less laudable instinct to magnify its importance, bombard the committees of Congress with projects, some more or less meritorious, some of no merit whatever, but all conceived in sublime indifference to the fact that the great business of Government is being run at a loss and that each one of these projects increases the deficit of the Government and consequently the burden to be thrown upon the great body of people, whether the deficit be met by increasing taxes or by floating additional loans. For no fallacy is more grotesque than the assumption that by issuing bonds or notes or certificates of indebtedness now we may pass on to future generations the burden of our own extravagance. The burden of these issues will have to be met to-day, not only in the interest and sinking fund charges added to an already heavy load, but in the expansion of credit which is inevitable as a result of the issue of such securities, constituting as they do a prime basis for additional credit in the hands of the holders, whoever they may be.

Passing on, reading another section of this statement:

You, gentlemen, I am sure, have learned as well as I by long service in Congress that the instincts and enthusiasms of departments, bureaus, and boards find support in the committees of Congress appointed to have charge of their particular affairs. As a result, we find that governmental expenditures initiated in a department of the Government charged with the specific business of creating an army, or of creating a navy, or of creating a merchant marine, or of stimulating commerce, or of protecting labor, or of aiding the development of agriculture is submitted to the Congress without consultation with or approval by the finance officer of the Government, the Secretary of the Treasury, who serves merely as a messenger and whose office is charged with the heavy burden of finding financial means in loans and taxes to meet expenditures, and when it reaches Congress is referred to the corresponding committees of the Congress whose specific function is also to see to the development of the Army, the Navy, the merchant marine, etc. And the Congress passes upon all of these projects—good, bad, and indifferent—without a report from the Committee on Ways and Means or the Committee on Finance, the committees of Congress which share with the Secretary of the Treasury the heavy burden of finance.

* * * * * * *

I think it amazing that under such a system the Congress has done so well for so long a time, but I feel constrained to warn you, gentlemen, in view of the greatly expanded activities of the Government and the extraordinary financial burdens which the country must endure, that it would be hazardous to continue on the old way of transacting the public business.

And then he goes on:

But I say to you it is an intolerable thing that such conditions should exist and that the welfare and economic life of the American people should be at the hazard of such things as these.

As a former colleague, and in a spirit of frank comradeship which such association inspires, I am prompted here to enter a complaint which may not be ascribed to a desire to be critical, but to a hope that it may be given serious attention in behalf of administrative efficiency. The Congress votes with a lavish hand stupendous sums conceived in a magnificent spirit of generosity, with a view to the enhancement of the prestige of the Nation or for the benefit of this or that element in the community. This it does upon the advice of the committee of Congress charged with the business of caring for such special interests. Then, speaking through the great Committee on Appropriations, it pursues a policy of restriction with relation to the expenditures of some of the departments of the Government which makes it impossible for those departments to conduct the vast affairs imposed upon them with efficiency and economy. The Government of the United States to-day is spending hundreds of millions of dollars, even billions of dollars, for armies, for navies, for merchant fleets, and other magnificent activities, and at the same time refusing the payment of a living wage to the faithful clerks and employees in departments of the Government charged with the stupendous responsibility of transacting these vast affairs honestly, expeditiously, and economically.

Then I want to read just one other section of this wonderful statement.

Referring to the claim made by the American Legion, or the soldiers, for a bonus, he says:

To-day the credit of the United States is imperiled by projects initiated and supported on the floor of Congress with a view to capturing the so-called soldier vote. I do not believe for a minute there is any such thing as the soldier vote. I do not believe that that magnificent body of strong, brave, lusty young men who went out to France, or were ready to go, want to see the people of the United States exploited in order that each of them may receive a donation. I do not believe these fine young men, if they realized what it is that is proposed in their behalf, would accept a gift made at the expense of their fathers and mothers and sisters and the children that are to come after them in order to give them a holiday. While, of course, you can not commit to terms of money the value of the service rendered by the Army of America, I call your attention to the fact that the actual pay of our soldiers was doubled at the outset of the war; that our soldiers have been paid with liberality never dreamed of in the history of this or any other country; and that the projects now advocated so lavishly and with so little regard for the welfare of the American people are not limited to those heroic men who suffered injury or death at the hands of the enemy, not even to those who actually saw the front, not even to those who were sent to France. These projects extend to everyone of some four and one-half million men, mostly young men, who were included in the military and naval forces of the United States, even to those of their number who sought and obtained employment of a character which would relieve them from being exposed to personal risk.

It has been the disheartening task of the Treasury to examine scores and scores of bills drawn and presented with a view to benefiting a section of the country or a portion of its citizenship at the expense of the whole. Many of these bills were apparently devised to avoid the appearance of an appropriation by requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds, notes, or certificates of indebtedness to meet the expenditure involved, and all of these bills were such as would not be reached by a purely executive budget.

Mr. President, I have criticized this measure because it makes an appropriation of $6,500,000 and imposes a fixed charge on our Government and a responsibility for educating a certain class of our citizens, when the duty to educate those people should rest upon the States of the Union. It may be that this appropriation is limited to $6,500,000; it may be that it is limited to one year; but if you establish this policy under a bureau of the Government, next year they will be here demanding more, pointing out the great need of extending and enlarging this system of education, and another appeal will be made, and Congress will weakly submit. What I am trying to impress upon Congress at the present time is that we have got to stop this spendthrift policy. From every section of this country there comes a demand that the taxes shall be lowered. From every section of this country there comes the demand that this Government shall stop appropriating its millions for every project, idealistic and otherwise, that could ever be conceived in the brain of man. I am going to vote hereafter against every one of these projects, and I am going to do my utmost to see that the appropriation bills are reduced. Economy is the watchword; and it is the duty of every Member of the Senate, no matter whether he is on the other side of the aisle or here, to do everything in his power at the present time to cut down these expenses and relieve the people of this country of this extreme burden of taxation, which, through the exigencies of the war, we have placed upon them. There does not seem to be any appeal that will get under our spendthrift hides. We go on, and go on recklessly; but now we must call a halt. No doubt many of these projects will be worthy; no doubt an argument can be made as to their necessity; but there is one need that this country has at the present time, and that is that its legislators shall have the nerve to stand up and say, "Thus far you may go, and no farther." Let us cut out these things. Let us economize.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am very glad to hear the admirable address of the Senator from New Jersey. In most of the views which he has so forcefully expressed I most heartily concur. I welcome my good friend from New Jersey to the ranks of the economists. There are a few who from time to time during the past year have been lifting their voices in behalf of economy and against these extravagant appropriations which have been made by the Government. Under the splendid leadership of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] a number of us have marched up the hill, but we have also marched back again. We have achieved no victories, bloodless or otherwise; but I think we are still here, ready to combat these large appropriations and to seek to adopt a policy of economy in the appropriations of the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I would not want my colleague to say that we have gained no victory. We have gained one or two, and I think they are going to increase in the future.

Mr. KING. I am glad my colleague reminded me of that fact. I do recall that there have been a few successes attending the efforts which have been put forth.

Mr. President, the lack of appreciation of the spendthrift qualities and characteristics of a legislative body is a remarkable thing. In most of the municipalities, counties, political subdivisions, school districts, and States, as well as in the Federal Congress, appropriations are being made, and in the past have been made, with an abandon and a recklessness wholly incompatible with the supposed thrift and economical characteristics of the great business men of our country. I believe the time has come when we must call a halt. As the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] has stated, with a deficit of $3,000,000,000, and it will be more, and with a bond issue which, it seems to me, is inevitable, with a burden of taxation resting upon the people imposed by the Federal Government, the American people will cry out with resentment and indignation against the continued extravagant appropriations made by the American Congress.

It is a remarkable thing, however, that some of these very same people who are denouncing the extravagant expenditures of the Federal Government are among the most earnest in seeking appropriations from the Federal Treasury. Demands are being made for appropriations for purely State and domestic affairs, and raids are being contemplated upon the Federal Treasury by those who are crying out for economy.

Mr. President, I rose, however, not for the purpose of indulging in a speech; but, if no one else has any amendment to offer at this time, to offer an amendment to the pending bill.

Mr. KENYON. There is an amendment pending. Does the Senator from South Dakota desire a vote on that amendment to-night, or does he prefer to have it go over until to-morrow?

Mr. STERLING. I am not particular about having a vote on my amendment to-night. I would prefer to have it go over.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KENYON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 30 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

THE WHITE HOUSE.

The PRESIDENT:

The undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President, with a view to its transmission to the Senate to receive the advice and consent of that body to its ratification, if his judgment approve thereof, a convention between the United States and Venezuela, to foster the development of commerce between them and to increase the exchange of commodities by facilitating the work of traveling salesmen, signed at Caracas July 3, 1919.

Respectfully submitted.

ROBERT LANSING.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington,

The United States of America and the United States of Venezuela, being desirous to foster the development of commerce between them and to increase the exchange of commodities by facilitating the work of traveling salesmen, have agreed to conclude a convention for that purpose and have to that end appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of America; Stewart Johnson, chargé d'affairs ad interim of the United States; and the President of the United States of Venezuela, Dr. Esteban Gil Borges, minister of foreign relations, who, having communicated to each other their full powers, which were found to be in due form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE I.

Manufacturers, merchants, and traders domiciled within the jurisdiction of one of the high contracting parties may operate as commercial travelers, either personally or by means of agents or employees, within the jurisdiction of the other high contracting party on obtaining from the latter, upon payment of a single fee, a license which shall be valid throughout its entire territorial jurisdiction.

In case either of the high contracting parties shall be engaged in war it reserves to itself the right to prevent from operating within its jurisdiction as commercial travelers, under the provisions of this treaty or otherwise, enemy nationals or other aliens whose presence it may consider prejudicial to public order and national safety.

ARTICLE II.

In order to secure the license above mentioned the applicant must obtain from the country of domicile of the manufacturers, merchants, and traders represented a certificate attesting his character as a commercial traveler. This certificate, which shall be issued by the authority to be designated in each country for the purpose, shall be viséed by the consul of the country in which the applicant proposes to operate, and the authorities of the latter shall, upon the presentation of such certificate, issue to the applicant the national license as provided in Article I.

ARTICLE III.

A commercial traveler may sell his samples without obtaining a special license as an importer, provided he sells them to merchants duly established dealing in similar articles.

ARTICLE IV.

Samples without commercial value shall be admitted to entry free of duty.

Samples marked, stamped, or defaced in such manner that they can not be put to other uses shall be considered as objects without commercial value.

ARTICLE V.

Samples having commercial value shall be provisionally admitted upon giving bond for the payment of lawful duties if they shall not have been withdrawn from the country within a period of six months.

Duties shall be paid on such portion of the samples as shall not have been so withdrawn.

ARTICLE VI.

All customs formalities shall be simplified as much as possible with a view to avoid delay in the dispatch of samples.

ARTICLE VII.

Peddlers and other salesmen who vend directly to the consumer, even though they have not an established place of business in the country in which they operate, shall not be considered as commercial travelers, but shall be subject to the license fees levied on business of the kind which they carry on.

ARTICLE VIII.

The license for commercial travelers established by Article II of this convention shall not be required of—

(a) Persons traveling only to study trade and its needs, even though they initiate commercial relations, provided they do not make sales of merchandise.

(b) Persons operating through local agencies which pay the licensee fee or other imposts to which their business is subject.

(c) Travelers who are exclusively buyers.

ARTICLE IX.

Any concession affecting any of the provisions of the present treaty that may hereafter be granted by either high contracting party, either by law or by treaty or convention, shall immediately be extended to the other party.

ARTICLE X.

The present convention shall remain in force until the end of six months after either of the high contracting parties shall have given notice to the other of its intention to terminate the same, each of them reserving to itself the right of giving such notice to the other at any time. And it is hereby agreed between the parties that on the expiration of six months after such notice shall have been received by either of them from the other party as above mentioned this convention shall altogether cease and terminate.

This convention shall be ratified and the ratifications shall be exchanged in Washington or Caracas within the briefest possible period.

In testimony whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed these articles and have thereunto affixed their seals.

Done in duplicate, in English and Spanish, at Caracas, this 3d day of July, 1919.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 21, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, when the world moves smoothly, the sun shines brightly, the winds blow softly, business is prospering, friends are many and hopes run high, it is comparatively easy to be a Christian.

But when adversities come thick and fast, the home is invaded by death and our loved ones are borne away, the heavens seem overcast with dark and lowering clouds, friends deceive us and hope seems despairing, then it is that the loving arms of a true and faithful God are about us—to uphold, sustain and guide us. Then it is that we need the strong arm of faith, the eternal hope of the soul, and a love which fails us not.

Increase our faith, hope, and love in Thee, O God our Father, and we will praise and magnify Thy holy name. In Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a speech made before the Illinois Manufacturers' Association in Chicago on the 9th day of January by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] on the subject of a national budget.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a speech made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] before the Illinois Manufacturers' Association on the subject of a national budget. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask whether that was a political speech or an economic speech.

Mr. CANNON. An economic speech, as I understand it.

Mr. GARNER. Then I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday. The Clerk will call the committees.

The Committee on Patents was called.

TRADE-MARKS AND COMMERCIAL NAMES.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Patents I call up the bill (H. R. 9023) to give effect to certain provisions of the convention for the protection of trade-marks and commercial names, made and signed in the city of Buenos Aires, in the Argentine Republic, August 20, 1910, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman calls up a bill which is on the Union Calendar. Under the rule the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 9023, with Mr. CRAMTON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Patents shall keep a register of all marks communicated to him by the international bureaus provided for by the convention for the protection of trade-marks and commercial names, made and signed in the city of Buenos Aires, in the Argentine Republic, August 20, 1910, in connection with which the fee of $50 gold for the international registration established by article 2 of that convention has been paid, which register shall show a facsimile of the mark; the name and residence of the registrant; the number, date, and place of the first registration of the mark, including the date on which application for such registration was filed and the term of such registration, a list of goods to which the mark is applied as shown by the registration in the country of origin, and such other data as may be useful concerning the mark.

SEC. 2. That whenever any person shall deem himself injured by the inclusion of a trade-mark on this register, he may at any time apply to the Commissioner of Patents to cancel the registration thereof. The commissioner shall refer such application to the examiner in charge of interferences, who is empowered to hear and determine this question, and who shall give notice thereof to the registrant. If it appear after a hearing before the examiner that the registrant was not entitled to the exclusive use of the mark at or since the date of his application for registration thereof, or that the mark is not used by the registrants or has been abandoned, and the examiner shall so decide, the commissioner shall cancel the registration. Appeal may be taken to the commissioner in person from the decision of the examiner in charge of interferences.

SEC. 3. That any person who shall willfully and with intent to deceive affix, apply, or annex, or use in connection with any article or articles of merchandise, or any container or containers of the same, a false designation of origin, including words or other symbols, tending to falsely identify the origin of the merchandise, and shall then cause such merchandise to enter into interstate or foreign commerce, and any person who shall knowingly transport such merchandise or cause or procure the same to be transported in interstate or foreign commerce or commerce with Indian tribes, or shall knowingly deliver the same to any carrier to be so transported, shall be liable to an action at law for damages and to an action in equity for an injunction, at the suit of any person, firm, or corporation doing business in the locality falsely indicated as that of origin, or in the region in which said locality is situated, or at the suit of any association of such persons, firms, or corporations.

SEC. 4. That any person who shall without the consent of the owner thereof reproduce, counterfeit, copy, or colorably imitate any trade-mark on the register provided by this act, and shall affix the same to merchandise of substantially the same descriptive properties as those set forth in the registration, or to labels, signs, prints, packages, wrappers, or receptacles intended to be used upon or in connection with the sale of merchandise of substantially the same descriptive properties as those set forth in such registration, and shall use, or shall have used, such reproduction, counterfeit, copy, or colorable imitation in commerce among the several States, or with a foreign nation, or with the Indian tribes, shall be liable to an action for damages therefor at the suit of the owner thereof; and whenever in any such action a verdict is rendered for the plaintiff the court may enter judgment therein for any sum above the amount found by the verdict as the actual damages, according to the circumstances of the case, not exceeding three times the amount of such verdict, together with the costs.

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of a registrant under this act to comply with the law of the country in which his original registration took place, in respect to giving notice to the public that the trade-mark is registered, in connection with the use of such trade-mark in the United States of America, and in any suit for infringement by a party failing to do this, no damages shall be recovered except on proof that the defendant was duly notified of the infringement and continued the same after such notice.

SEC. 6. That the provisions of sections 15, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 25, 26, 27, and 29 of the act approved February 20, 1905, entitled "An act to authorize the registration of trade-marks used in commerce with foreign nations or among the several States or with Indian tribes, and to protect the same," as amended to date, are hereby made applicable to marks placed on the register provided for by section 1 of this act.

SEC. 7. That written or printed copies of any records, books, papers, or drawings belonging to the Patent Office and relating to trade-marks placed on the register provided for by this act, when authenticated by the seal of the Patent Office and certified by the commissioner thereof, shall be evidence in all cases wherein the originals could be evidence, and any person making application therefor and paying the fee required by law shall have certified copies thereof.

SEC. 8. That the same fees shall be required for certified and uncertified copies of papers and for records, transfers, and other papers, under this act, as are required by law for such copies of patents and for recording assignments and other papers relating to patents.

On filing an appeal to the Commissioner of Patents from the decision of the examiner in charge of interferences, awarding ownership of a trade-mark, canceling or refusing to cancel the registration of a trade-mark, a fee of $15 shall be payable.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes to give effect to certain provisions of the convention for the protection of trade-marks and commercial names made and signed in the city of Buenos Aires on August 20, 1910.

The bill is identical with a bill that passed the Senate in the Sixty-fifth Congress and reported out late in the last Congress by the Committee on Patents of the House. There is no opposition to it. The Secretary of the Treasury, both in the Sixty-fifth Congress and in this Congress, sent to the chairman of the Committee on Patents a letter, a copy of which is included in the report, strongly urging the immediate passage of this legislation. The Commissioner of Patents, representatives of the international high commission, the American Patent Law Association, and a large number of representatives of manufacturers and commercial institutions in this country appeared before our committee earnestly urging the immediate passage of the legislation.

The delegates representing the United States at this convention were Henry White, Enos H. Crowder, Lewis Nixon, John Bassett Moore, Bernard Moses, Lamar C. Quintero, Paul S. Reinsch, and David Kinley.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. NOLAN. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. LITTLE. Do I understand that this convention or assembly of delegates of the different countries made this treaty in 1910?

Mr. NOLAN. That is correct.

Mr. LITTLE. Why this frantic haste to enact this bill into law? Why not wait another 10 years?

Mr. NOLAN. If the gentleman will give me an opportunity to explain the bill, he will become acquainted with the facts.

Mr. LITTLE. That is just what I want to get.

Mr. NOLAN. If the gentleman will give me time to explain the measure, there will not be any necessity for his questions.

Mr. LITTLE. What is the hurry about this? We have waited only 10 years already!

Mr. NOLAN. Only in the last few years have the northern section of the South American Republics ratified the convention. They have now ratified it, and so has the Republic of Cuba. At the present time there is established at Habana a bureau for the registration of trade-marks and commercial names. This gives an opportunity to American manufacturers and those interested in the protection of trade-marks and commercial names to go to the Patent Office or file with the Commissioner of Patents a registration, and for the sum of $50 American trade-marks, trade names, and commercial names are given protection in all of the Central and South American Republics and in the Republic of Cuba. At the present time, owing to the fact that we have not ratified and put into effect the provisions of this convention, our manufacturers must go to each one of these separate Republics and get separate protection, taking a lot of time and a great deal of money. This convention should have been ratified a long time ago. All this bill does is to give the Commissioner of Patents authority to keep a register of all trade-marks and commercial names communicated to him by the international bureau provided for by the convention for the protection of trade-marks and commercial names, and the fee of $50 is transmitted to this international bureau.

There is not any considerable amount of work placed on the Commissioner of Patents or the Patent Office by this bill; but the amount of additional fees that are brought in the Commissioner of Patents feels confident will take care of any clerical expenses of the registration bureau.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. I will.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman explain the provisions of section 2 which provide that whenever any person shall deem himself injured by the inclusion of a trade-mark on this register he may at any time apply to the Commissioner of Patents to cancel the registration? Is that an injury to an American citizen by reason of the inclusion of a trade-mark in a foreign country; and if so, wherein does the injury consist? I am asking the question for information.

Mr. NOLAN. The trade-mark laws of this country are radically different from those of the South American Republics and from practically every country in the world. A trade-mark will not be granted on any article that describes the article itself. We have certain restrictions that are not imposed by any Central South American Republic. So, if some man in a South American Republic should secure a trade-mark registration upon an American trade-mark not registrable in this country, his registration of that trade-mark in Habana, or wherever he may see fit in a South American Republic, will not give him any rights he does not possess in this country. Neither will it give an American any right that he does not possess at the present time. So, if a trade-mark is registered from a South American Republic and gets by the Commissioner of Patents without protest, the injured party can come in and get protection under section 2.

Mr. BEE. Without this law they could not file this trade-mark that the American could hereafter complain of?

Mr. NOLAN. No; without a complete investigation by the Patent Office. I have explained that we are not imposing any additional work on the Patent Office. This merely provides for registration at the present time on an application for trade-mark, not carefully inquired into, provided the application is made to the Patent Office. This does not entail that character of work on the Patent Office; it gives the Patent Office the right to register it, and the registrant is not entitled to any protection not now in order under our laws.

Mr. BEE. Suppose here is an American who has a trade-mark, and establishes it in Habana or Rio Janeiro, and some man down there puts this trade-mark into this foreign registry to the injury of the American. Now, is there any protection to the American in the interval if it became necessary to cancel the registration to protect himself against injury by the unlawful filing of the trade-mark?

Mr. NOLAN. If the foreign registrant has protection in the country where originally registered under the law. In times gone by this does not deprive him of the right. He may have registered in a South American Republic some valuable trade-mark of this country. He can not come into this country and use the trade-mark to the detriment of the legitimate owner of the trade-mark. The man who possesses the right in this country can not be injured.

Mr. BEE. What is the injury to the American holding the trade-mark necessary to protect himself?

Mr. NOLAN. It protects him to this extent. The fact that the trade name has been entered on the registry does not give the man that makes the application any right, but the second provision is a safeguard to the American manufacturer or the owner of the trade-mark or the commercial name.

Mr. MERRITT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. MERRITT. Do I understand that the registration of the trade-mark contemplated by the bill is distinct from the registration under our own law?

Mr. NOLAN. Absolutely separate and distinct. It is only for the purpose of keeping a record of these trade-marks and commercial names in the International Bureau.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the law, or will its administration, in any way affect the situation with reference to German patents upon which we have had some legislation heretofore? Will it protect them or give them a right to take advantage of it?

Mr. NOLAN. No; this only provides for trade-marks in a convention entered into between the United States and the Central and South American Republics and the Republic of Cuba.

Mr. WALSH. So that the register kept under the provisions of this act will only include the registry of those trade-marks and names from the South American Republics or countries which took part in this proposed convention?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes; only those who were a party to the convention. The convention was particularly confined to the Central and South American Republics and the Republic of Cuba. Only those participating in it will be entitled to the benefits of this act.

Mr. WALSH. It does not include European countries?

Mr. NOLAN. It does not. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to include in my remarks the proceedings of the convention. It comprises only about four pages and it will not take up much of the RECORD, and I am sure it will be enlightening to those interested in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner stated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The convention is as follows:

Who, after having presented their credentials and the same having been found in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following convention for the protection of trade-marks:

ARTICLE I. The signatory nations enter into this convention for the protection of trade-marks and commercial names.

ART. II. Any mark duly registered in one of the signatory States shall be considered as registered also in the other States of the union, without prejudice to the rights of third persons and to the provisions of the laws of each State governing the same.

In order to enjoy the benefit of the foregoing, the manufacturer or merchant interested in the registry of the mark must pay, in addition to the fees or charges fixed by the laws of the State in which application for registration is first made, the sum of $50 gold, which sum shall cover all the expenses of both bureaus for the international registration in all the signatory States.

ART. III. The deposit of a trade-mark in one of the signatory States produces in favor of the depositor a right of priority for the period of six months, so as to enable the depositor to make the deposit in the other States.

Therefore the deposit made subsequently and prior to the expiration of this period can not be annulled by acts performed in the interval, especially by another deposit, by publication, or by the use of the mark.

ART. IV. The following shall be considered as trade-mark: Any sign, emblem, or especial name that merchants or manufacturers may adopt or apply to their goods or products in order to distinguish them from those of other manufacturers or merchants who manufacture or deal in articles of the same kind.

ART. V. The following can not be adopted or used as trade-mark: National, provincial, or municipal flags or coats of arms; immoral or scandalous figures; distinctive marks which may have been obtained by others or which may give rise to confusion with other marks; the general classification of articles; pictures or names of persons without their permission; and any design which may have been adopted as an emblem by any fraternal or humanitarian association.

The foregoing provisions shall be construed without prejudice to the particular provisions of the laws of each State.

ART. VI. All questions which may arise regarding the priority of the deposit or the adoption of a trade-mark shall be decided with due regard to the date of the deposit in the State in which the first application was made therefor.

ART. VII. The ownership of a trade-mark includes the right to enjoy the benefits thereof and the right of assignment or transfer in whole or in part of its ownership or its use in accordance with the provisions of the laws of the respective States.

ART. VIII. The falsification, imitation, or unauthorized use of a trade-mark, as also the false representation as to the origin of a product, shall be prosecuted by the interested party in accordance with the laws of the State wherein the offense is committed.

For the effects of this article, interested parties shall be understood to be any producer, manufacturer, or merchant engaged in the production, manufacture, or traffic of said product, or in the case of false representation of origin, one doing business in the locality falsely indicated as that of origin, or in the territory in which said locality is situated.

ART. IX. Any person in any of the signatory States shall have the right to petition and obtain in any of the States, through its competent judicial authority, the annulment of the registration of a trade-mark, when he shall have made application for the registration of that mark, or of any other mark calculated to be confused, in such State, with the mark in whose annulment he is interested upon proving—

(a) That the mark the registration whereof he solicits has been employed or used within the country prior to the employment or use of the mark registered by the person registering it or by the persons from whom he has derived title;

(b) That the registrant had knowledge of the ownership, employment, or use in any of the signatory States of the mark of the applicant the annulment whereof is sought prior to the use of the registered mark by the registrant or by those from whom he has derived title;

(c) That the registrant had no right to the ownership, employment, or use of the registered mark on the date of its deposit;

(d) That the registered mark had not been used or employed by the registrant or by his assigns within the term fixed by the laws of the State in which the registration shall have been made.

ART. X. Commercial names shall be protected in all the States of the union, without deposit or registration, whether the same form part of a trade-mark or not.

ART. XI. For the purposes indicated in the present convention a union of American nations is hereby constituted, which shall act through two international bureaus established, one in the city of Habana, Cuba, and the other in the city of Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, acting in complete accord with each other.

ART. XII. The international bureaus shall have the following duties:

1. To keep a register of the certificates of ownership of trade-mark issued by any of the signatory States.

2. To collect such reports and data as relate to the protection of intellectual and industrial property and to publish and circulate them among the nations of the union, as well as to furnish them whatever special information they may need upon this subject.

3. To encourage the study and publicity of the questions relating to the protection of intellectual and industrial property; to publish for this purpose one or more official reviews containing the full texts or digest of all documents forwarded to the bureaus by the authorities of the signatory States.

The Governments of said States shall send to the international American bureau their official publications which contain the announcements of the registrations of trade-marks, and commercial names, and the grants of patents and privileges, as well as the judgments rendered by the respective courts concerning the invalidity of trade-marks and patents.

4. To communicate to the Governments of the union any difficulties or obstacles that may oppose or delay the effective application of this convention.

5. To aid the Governments of the signatory States in the preparations of international conferences for the study of legislation concerning industrial property, and to secure such alterations as it may be proper to propose in the regulations of the union, or in treaties in force to protect industrial property. In case such conferences take place, the directors of the bureaus shall have the right to attend the meetings and there to express their opinions, but not to vote.

6. To present to the Governments of Cuba and of the United States of Brazil, respectively, yearly reports of their labors, which shall be communicated at the same time to all the Governments of the other States of the union.

7. To initiate and establish relations with similar bureaus and with the scientific and industrial associations and institutions for the exchange of publications, information, and data conducive to the progress of the protection of industrial property.

8. To investigate cases where trade-marks, designs, and industrial models have failed to obtain the recognition of registration provided for by this convention on the part of the authorities of any one of the States forming the union and to communicate the facts and reasons to the Government of the country of origin and to interested parties.

9. To cooperate as agents for each one of the Governments of the signatory States before the respective authorities for the better performance of any act tending to promote or accomplish the ends of this convention.

ART. XIII. The bureau established in the city of Habana, Cuba, shall have charge of the registration of trade-marks coming from the United States of America, Mexico, Cuba, Haiti, the Dominican Republic, El Salvador, Honduras, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Guatemala, and Panama.

The bureau established in the city of Rio de Janeiro shall have charge of the registration of trade-marks coming from Brazil, Uruguay, the Argentine Republic, Paraguay, Bolivia, Chile, Peru, Ecuador, Venezuela, and Colombia.

ART. XIV. The two international bureaus shall be considered as one, and for the purpose of the unification of the registrations it is provided:

(a) Both shall have the same books and the same accounts kept under an identical system;

(b) Copies shall be reciprocally transmitted weekly from one to the other of all applications, registrations, communications, and other documents affecting the recognition of the rights of owners of trade-marks.

ART. XV. The international bureaus shall be governed by identical regulations, formed with the concurrence of the Governments of the Republic of Cuba and of the United States of Brazil and approved by all the other signatory States.

Their budgets, after being sanctioned by the said Governments, shall be defrayed by all the signatory States in the same proportion as that established for the International Bureau of the American Republics at Washington, and in this particular they shall be placed under the control of those Governments within whose territories they are established.

The international bureaus may establish such rules of practice and procedure, not inconsistent with the terms of this convention, as they may deem necessary and proper to give effect to its provisions.

ART. XVI. The Governments of the Republic of Cuba and of the United States of Brazil shall proceed with the organization of the bureaus of the international union as herein provided upon the ratification of this convention by at least two-thirds of the nations belonging to each group.

The simultaneous establishment of both bureaus shall not be necessary; one only may be established if there be the number of adherent Governments provided for above.

ART. XVII. The treaties on trade-marks previously concluded by and between the signatory States, shall be substituted by the present convention from the date of its ratification, as far as the relations between the signatory States are concerned.

ART. XVIII. The ratifications or adhesion of the American States to the present convention shall be communicated to the Government of the Argentine Republic, which shall lay them before the other States of the union. These communications shall take the place of an exchange of ratifications.

ART. XIX. Any signatory State that may see fit to withdraw from the present convention shall so notify the Government of the Argentine Republic, which shall communicate this fact to the other States of the union, and one year after the receipt of such communication this convention shall cease with regard to the State that shall have withdrawn.

In witness whereof the plenipotentiaries and delegates sign this convention and affix to it the seal of the Fourth International American Conference.

Made and signed in the city of Buenos Aires, on the 20th day of August, in the year 1920, in Spanish, English, Portuguese, and French, and filed in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Argentine Republic in order that certified copies may be made, to be forwarded through appropriate diplomatic channels to each one of the signatory nations.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The bill on page 3 provides that—

Any person who shall knowingly transport such merchandise or cause or procure the same to be transported in interstate or foreign commerce or commerce with Indian tribes—and so forth, shall be liable to an action at law. I presume that the author of that provision had in mind, when he used the word "knowingly" a person who transported any of the articles contrary to law—that is, that the articles were contrary to the law; but to knowingly transport means that the transportation company knows that it is transporting. The transportation company would not know whether the articles are in violation of the law or not, and usually could not know. There have been a great many propositions of that sort submitted to Congress in the course of many years, and I think they have always been changed when they came before this House.

Mr. NOLAN. The section ought to be taken in its entirety—

That any person who shall willfully and with intent to deceive, affix, apply, or annex, or use in connection with any article or articles of merchandise, or any container or containers of the same, a false designation of origin, including words or other symbols, tending to falsely identify the origin of the merchandise, and shall then cause such merchandise to enter into interstate or foreign commerce, and any person who shall knowingly transport such merchandise or cause or procure the same to be transported in interstate or foreign commerce or commerce with Indian tribes, or shall knowingly deliver the same to any carrier to be so transported, shall be liable to an action at law.

And so forth.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The man who does that ought to be punished, but the transportation company that transports the article knowingly, knowing that it transports it, not knowing what it is, ought not to be punished, yet it is liable to be indicted under the language of this law. It is never safe in enacting a law to presume that the administrative officers will use any common sense, and if the law so provides they are liable to commence action.

Mr. NOLAN. I have no objection to amending it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It is all right to penalize the man who does the thing.

Mr. NOLAN. I think it should be confined to that. I have no objection to amending that section so that no transportation company who shall innocently transport any article shall be subject to being dragged into court or be in any way seriously inconvenienced.

I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT].

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Chairman, the committee perhaps understands that the importance of this bill is, in the first place, to carry out the convention which was entered into by the Central and South American Republics with this country. The reason for that, so far as this country is concerned, is to protect the manufacturers and the merchants of this country against the so-called trade-mark pirates.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman tell us why we have had to wait 10 years after that treaty was made before any steps were taken to carry it into effect?

Mr. MERRITT. I am not on the committee and I do not know the details as well as the chairman, but my understanding is that the delay of this legislation has been due to the delay on the part of other countries in accepting this convention and getting the necessary machinery ready to carry it on. Is that correct, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. NOLAN. That is right.

Mr. MERRITT. So that, so far as the Patent Committee goes and this House goes, there has been no unnecessary delay in the legislation. It is very difficult for those of us who have been brought up under the law of this country and under the general impression that a man who establishes a trade name and a trade-mark is entitled to its use, and that a man can only establish the right to such a trade-mark by use, to understand why that rule does not prevail elsewhere. It is hard for us to understand the law which exists in many of the countries of South America, that any man, whether he has any connection with the trade-mark or the trade name, can go to the registration office and register that trade-mark and keep out from that country the real creator of the trade-mark and, under our law, the owner. For instance, he can go to the registration office and register a name like "Singer," for the Singer sewing machine, if it has not already been registered in that country, and when a consignment of those Singer machines comes to that company, sent by the Singer people, they can not be landed. There are numerous instances of that sort, and it is to correct that difficulty that this legislation is proposed. It seems to me it does not require much argument to show its necessity. The machinery is very simple, it is inexpensive, and it is already in operation, and I think it is obviously desirable in these times when so many American manufacturers have expanded, owing to the war, when they must have an outlet for their products, when they must expand their foreign trade, to give them the necessary protection in such foreign trade.

I heard only this morning in another hearing before the Patent Committee an illustration which, I think, will be interesting to the committee: Where a manufacturer of Connecticut clocks was in Japan, and found there exact imitations of clocks that are made in a certain town in Connecticut—not only exactly so far as the mechanism is concerned but an exact imitation of the color and the case and the actual trade-mark. When he ascertained how this came about he found that originally the clocks had been imitated in the Black Forest of Germany, that they had been exported to Japan, and then, when Japan began to develop as a manufacturing country, with its very cheap labor, they were reproduced exactly in Japan, with the shape, the mechanism, the color, and the trade-mark. It is to protect the manufacturers and merchants of this country in their trade names, so important to them, that this legislation is proposed. The protection of the trade name is more important to the manufacturer in other countries than it is at home, because in the East particularly it is the practice to buy on the name. That is true also of textiles, food products, and all kinds of manufactures—sewing machines, clocks and watches, and everything else. They buy on the name. There are no two sides to this question. It is the duty of this House to pass this legislation and to protect in Central and South America the trade of this country and its manufacturers and merchants, as this bill, in connection with the Buenos Aires convention, will do.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, as has already been stated, it is necessary for the Congress to enact this legislation before the United States will become a member of this convention. In 1910 the United States had eight representatives, all of them eminently qualified, including such men as Henry White, Enoch H. Crowder, John Bassett Moore, and others, who participated in the proceedings which culminated in the adoption of the convention of which we are now seeking to become a member. Briefly stated, the purpose of becoming a member of this convention is in order to simplify and expedite and lessen the cost of registration in the various South American and Central American countries, together with the Republics of Mexico and Cuba.

Mr. NOLAN. Mexico is not included.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. While Mexico has not adopted the convention, it is eligible for membership if it does adopt the convention.

As the conditions are now, before an American manufacturer can register his trade-mark in all of those countries, it will cost him over $500 and also involve a great deal of trouble and delay. He can register his trade-mark in all of those countries for a total cost of $50, and do it very quickly and expeditiously, under this convention. Now, it occurs to me that it is especially important and opportune at this time for the United States to become a member of this convention, when we are all looking to Central and South America as a future market for a large portion of our products. We are all working to that end, and it is undoubtedly a great field. And all of these manufacturers are loath to enter into these foreign fields unless they feel that they will have adequate trade-mark protection, protection against such conditions as were explained by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT].

Now, there is another reason why, it occurs to me, it is opportune at this time for us to enact this bill. A Pan American Congress is now in session in the city of Washington. The purpose of it is to promote cooperation between the United States and the Central and South American countries, and to arrange trade and financial relations and connections which will result in closer intercourse, which is certainly very beneficial and very much desired on the part of the United States.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Can the gentleman tell the committee what arrangements other governments of the world have with respect to registration of their trade-marks in the South American countries—England, for instance, and France?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Well, I can not answer specifically any further than to say that those different countries have laws, as we have, permitting foreign trade-marks to be registered upon certain conditions. And there is a considerable variety of provisions in the different countries. One thing that made it difficult to adopt a convention which would be acceptable to all the countries involved was that very thing. But this convention does not give any rights whatever to any European or Asiatic manufacturers.

Further referring to your question and also to the question propounded by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], I will state that the articles of the convention itself, which the chairman has asked to be incorporated as a part of his remarks, provides in article 1:

> The signatory nations enter into this convention for the protection of trade-marks and commercial names.

No nation other than those designated in the articles of convention, to wit, the South and Central American countries, the United States, Cuba, and Mexico, can become a member.

Article 2 provides:

> Any mark duly registered in one of the signatory States shall be considered as registered also in the other States of the Union, without prejudice to the rights of third persons and to the provisions of the laws of each State governing the same.

That also answers the question propounded by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEE]. In other words, it will not give foreign manufacturers any rights in the United States which they do not already acquire when they obtain trade-mark protection under our general laws, and it does not give any higher rights to any of the respective members of the convention than could be obtained by registering under the laws of the various countries which have become members of the convention. It merely simplifies, expedites, and lessens the cost of registration.

As I started to remark when I was interrupted, it occurs to me that it would be very appropriate for us to show the interest of the Congress and a friendliness on our part and an earnest wish to cooperate with these South American countries, by enacting this bill while the representatives of these various nations are in our city working with the representatives of our Nation in an earnest effort to further these trade relations. I think it would be a beautiful tribute to the fact that they are our guests in the city and the Nation, and it would manifest an interest which no doubt would be gratifying to them.

At the time the Commissioner of Patents appeared before our committee he stated that, lacking two, two-thirds of the signatory powers had already adopted this convention. There has been delay on the part of many of them for the reason that there is always delay in adopting a new departure. We know of no opposition to the measure. The Secretary of State and the entire State Department favor it and are very much interested in it. Secretary of the Treasury GLASS addressed a letter to the chairman of our committee, in which he strongly recommends the passage of this legislation. The Commissioner of Patents favors it. A representative of the American Patent Laws' Association appeared before us and favored it, as well as other gentlemen who are competent to speak upon it. I can conceive of no reason why we should not quickly pass the bill. I can conceive of no evil result that would follow, and it certainly would result in many very great benefits. So far as the expense is concerned, as stated by Secretary GLASS, after we get the convention into operation there will be no further expense. It is intended and expected to be self-supporting. In other words, the fees will be sufficient to maintain the office and conduct the convention.

I trust that the committee will pass this bill, and I am sure that it will result in very great benefits which I have not even undertaken to explain. [Applause.]

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, it is well known that the State of Connecticut, which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor, is very greatly interested in the subject of patents. From time immemorial Connecticut has furnished its full share of inventors and patented inventions. The manufacturers and the inventors are specially interested. I mean by this that they are first interested, but the interest is general, because what affects them affects business and in the end affects all.

Of course, I am in favor of a bill to protect patents and trade-marks and prevent the pirating of patents and trade-marks, and I expect to support this bill. I note in the latter portion of the bill that it provides for furnishing certain certified copies, and also for certain fees to be paid, which, I understand, will make this bill self-supporting. I also understand that our entire Patent Office is more than self-supporting, which leads me to another matter not directly connected with this bill, and yet bearing somewhat upon it. I refer to the deplorable condition in the Patent Office in regard to the transaction of public business there.

I have complaints, and no doubt other Members of Congress have the same, from numerous people, to the effect that it is impossible for them to get even printed copies of patents. Where it is necessary to get a certified copy, it has to be prepared outside of the office, and even then it requires days or weeks before a simple certification of it can be had. Even the correspondence of the office is delayed, and the adjudications upon the patent applications are universally slow.

I have prepared and introduced a House resolution which, with the consent of the chairman of this committee and the rest of the House, I shall hope to have passed, calling for information on this very subject, as to what is the cause of these delays which have been growing from bad to worse.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I will state to the gentleman that the Committee on Patents has had hearings upon different bills in which the matters to which the gentleman refers have been discussed by the Commissioner of Patents and others, and they explain that the growth in the patent business has so far outrun the appropriations and the allowances for help that that fact has brought about the situation complained of.

There is a further fact that should receive consideration, and that is that there have been no increases in salaries in the Patent Office since 1870, I think, and it is impossible for them to keep the trained men they have. About the time they become proficient somebody else offers them more money. The Committee on Patents now has under consideration a bill providing for the allowance of additional employees and increased salaries, and it is hoped that the passage of such bill will remedy the situation to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. TILSON. I am glad the Committee on Patents is contemplating taking action, because there is great complaint, at least, from people in my State in regard to this matter. I have sought to make explanation to them, but in order to do so more intelligently I have asked by this resolution to be furnished with information. I have not made my resolution privileged, because, in addition to the facts desired, I have asked for the opinion of the Commissioner of Patents as to whether there is not some way in which the situation can be made better. Asking for an opinion would make it not privileged, and therefore I should have to ask unanimous consent.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Certainly.

Mr. NOLAN. I will state to the gentleman that the Committee on Patents during the month of July last held extensive hearings on this subject; that is, to put the Patent Office on an efficient basis, as well as amending the patent laws and providing for a court of patent appeals. There is a program in connection with it, and the Committee on Patents has devoted a great deal of time and attention to the matter. We are about to report a bill that will take care of that serious condition in the Patent Office and give them sufficient help to put the Patent Office on an efficient basis, so that it can function, as well as to keep those highly trained men that they have down there in the Patent Office by paying them sufficient compensation to retain them. Many of their best men have gone into private life.

The policy of this House is a program of economy. We want to take care of the additional expense by increased fees as well as final fees for copies of patents. I think that within a few weeks the Committee on Patents will be able to bring in a measure that will take care of that situation.

Mr. TILSON. The Patent Office, as I have said, pays for itself. It is self-supporting. For that reason I think the public is entitled to prompt service, because sometimes it means a great deal in the transaction of important business.

Mr. NOLAN. I agree with the gentleman. The inventors and the manufacturers of this country have been laboring for several years under a very serious handicap.

Mr. TILSON. That is what prompted the resolution that I have introduced, and I hope, at least, to get sufficient information to be enabled to give an intelligent response to the many complaints that have been made to me on the subject.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. The Patent Office has not only been self-supporting but it has paid $8,000,000 into the Treasury beyond what it has taken out, and I believe that every member of the Committee on Patents will favor the bill to which I previously referred, and that it will be shortly reported.

Mr. TILSON. My judgment, perhaps not founded upon as much information as the gentleman possesses on the subject, is that we have been treating the examiners and other highly qualified employees of that important office as ordinary clerical help. They are more than mere clerks. They are experts, in a way, and we shall probably have to pay them accordingly or else we shall not be able to get expert service in this very important bureau of the Government, which is so vitally connected with the industrial progress of the country.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting extracts from a letter received from a very prominent business man and manufacturer in my State on this subject.

Mr. WALSH. On this bill?

Mr. TILSON. In connection with this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by inserting the extracts referred to. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Are the letters upon the subject of this bill?

Mr. TILSON. Only extracts from a single letter in regard to the matters I have been speaking of.

Mr. WALSH. In connection with this bill?

Mr. TILSON. As I said in my opening remarks, some of the things I had to say were not strictly confined to this bill but related to patent legislation now pending before this committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following are the extracts referred to:

The deplorable condition of work at the United States Patent Office is so apparent and so detrimental to the best interests of manufacturers like ourselves that we are led to write you concerning it as it appears to us from our experience.

* * * * * * *

There are daily evidences of bad conditions, which have an immediate and important effect upon our interests and to all inventors and manufacturers.

It is difficult—almost impossible—to get a printed copy of a granted patent or the rendering of an opinion. It was formerly possible to get such copies within two or three days. Now it takes at least a week or 10 days, and in many cases printed copies of patents are exhausted, so that no copies can be obtained. When it comes to manuscript copies, which are of great importance and very necessary at times, they are so difficult to obtain that oftentimes a copy must be prepared by the attorney, sent to the Patent Office to be certified, and paid for when it is certified the same as if it had been made by the Patent Office; and when copies are sent to be certified it takes several weeks or months before they are returned with the certificate.

There is also a great delay in the acknowledgment of applications sent to the Patent Office for filing, or assignments sent for record, which is again very detrimental to business. * * * These conditions seem to be unjust to the inventors and manufacturers, because the Patent Office is self-supporting, has to its credit some $8,000,000 which have been paid in fees, in excess of expenses, and it would seem there is no valid reason why Congress should not appreciate the situation and pass some legislation which will relieve it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MACGREGOR].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have compiled some figures from various sources with reference to the war, which several Members have asked me to put into shape so that they might be available to all. I will read them, as follows:

INTERESTING FACTS CONCERNING THE WAR.

1. The total costs of the war to all nations was about $186,000,000,000.

2. The expenditures of the United States were about $22,000,000,000.

3. The expenditures by the United States were about equal to those of Austria-Hungary.

4. During the first three months our expenditures were at the rate of $2,000,000 per day; during the next year they averaged more than $22,000,000 per day. For the final 10 months the daily average was over $44,000,000 per day.

5. The Ordnance Department spent $1,191,182,850 for artillery, the result of which was to deliver 72 American-made guns on the firing line.

6. The total expenditures of the Army itself amounted to $14,214,061,000.

7. The total of the Army expenditures about equals the value of all the gold produced in the whole world from the discovery of America up to the outbreak of the war.

8. The item of pay for the Army is larger than the combined salaries of all the public-school principals and teachers in the United States for the five years from 1912 to 1916.

9. The number of men serving in the armed forces of the United States during the war was 4,800,000, of whom 4,000,000 served in the Army.

10. Of the 54,000,000 males in the United States, 26,000,000 were registered in the draft or were already in the service.

11. New York State furnished the greatest number of men of any State—367,864. Porto Rico furnished 16,538, Hawaii 5,644, Philippines 255.

12. Two out of every three American soldiers who reached France took part in battle. The number who reached France was 2,084,000, and of those 1,390,000 saw active service at the front.

13. American divisions were in battle for 200 days and engaged in 13 major operations.

14. In October, 1918, the American divisions held 101 miles of line, or 23 per cent of the entire western front.

15. In the Battle of St. Mihiel 550,000 Americans were engaged, as compared with about 100,000 on the northern side in the Battle of Gettysburg.

16. The Meuse-Argonne battle lasted 47 days, during which 1,200,000 American troops were engaged.

17. The American battle losses of the war were 50,000 killed and 236,000 wounded.

18. The total sum expended by the munitions section of the Ordnance Department was $3,173,054,546; 10,637,359 American shells of all descriptions were landed in France. The British fired 2,753,000 rounds of ammunition in their preparation for the Battle of Messines Ridge and 4,000,000 rounds in preparation for the Battle of the Somme.

19. Five out of every six men sent to hospitals on account of wounds were cured and returned to duty.

20. The death loss from all causes among American forces was 122,500, of which about 10,000 were in the Navy.

21. Pneumonia killed more soldiers than were killed in battle.

22. When the war was declared the United States had two aviation fields and 55 obsolete airplanes. There was expended for aircraft production $1,055,000,000. At the time that the armistice was signed there were 196 American-built airplanes on the front.

23. The Construction Division expended $818,000,000 for cantonments, etc., in the United States.

24. Housing constructed had a capacity of 1,800,000 men, or more than the entire population of Philadelphia.

25. There were 227,447 motor vehicles manufactured in the United States for the War Department; 118,900 were shipped overseas; 8,444 motor vehicles were purchased overseas.

26. Thirty-nine thousand nine hundred and ninety-three motor vehicles were shipped to France after the signing of the armistice, and included in the sale to France.

27. During our 19 months of war more than 2,000,000 American soldiers were carried to France. Of every 100 men who went overseas 49 were carried in British ships, 45 in American, 3 in Italian, 2 in French, 1 in Russian.

28. American Engineers built in France 83 new ship berths, 1,000 miles of standard-gauge track, and 538 miles of narrow-gauge track.

29. The Signal Corps strung in France 100,000 miles of telephone and telegraph wire.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not know how the gentleman is going to end his argument. On Calendar Wednesday the debate is limited to the subject matter of the bill. If the gentleman's speech is not going to terminate in politics, I do not care to object. If it is a matter of information for the House, I shall not object.

Mr. MacGREGOR. It is just for the information of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas withdraw his point of order?

Mr. BLANTON. I withdraw it.

Mr. MacGREGOR (continuing):

30. At the time of the signing of the armistice the Signal Corps was operating 282 telephone exchanges and 133 telegraph stations. The telephone lines numbered 14,956, reaching 8,959 stations.

31. Seventy-five per cent of the entire leather production of the country was used during the war.

32. With 391,000 horses in the Army, orders were given to the Procurement Division to contract for 845,000 saddles and 1,000,000 sets of harness.

33. If all the orders had been filled it would have taken 300,000 more hides than the entire take-off of the United States for a year.

34. There was delivered to the War Department up to May 31, 1918, 131,800,000 pairs wool socks, 85,000,000 undershirts, 83,600,000 underdrawers, 30,700,000 pairs shoes, 21,700,000 blankets, 21,700,000 wool trousers, 12,900,000 coats, 8,300,000 overcoats.

35. Army supplies and property that the United States had in France, costing us $1,426,000,000, was sold to France for $400,000,000.

36. Some of the items, with cost price to the United States, were: Flour, $15,500,000; bacon, $41,300,000; beef, $58,890,000; coffee, $6,500,000; sugar, $3,200,000; flannel shirts, $17,200,000; underwear, $25,551,000; shoes, $36,880,000; socks, $9,000,000; blankets, $12,400,000.

37. Included in the sale to France were 89,199 motor vehicles costing the United States $310,739,694.

38. If the $22,000,000,000 that the war cost the United States were counted in silver dollars, it would take a man counting 72 a minute working 8 hours a day 1,744 years to count them.

If the silver dollars were laid side by side, they would stretch 520,833 miles.

Their weight would be 687,500 short tons.

Loaded in box cars of 40 tons capacity they would make a train of 17,187 cars 130 miles in length.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York yields back two minutes.

Mr. NOLAN. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California has nine minutes remaining.

Mr. NOLAN. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MacCRATE].

Mr. MacCRATE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, one of the underlying reasons for this legislation is the piracy of American trade-marks and commercial names in certain countries. There are some countries which require that the home registration must be filed first in that country before they will file a registration of the mark. In some countries, however, that is not true, and anyone can take an American name which we value very highly in this country and, without producing a single item of goods or wares under that name, file it and keep the American manufacturer out of that country. In one case $100,000 worth of American goods were manufactured in this country and sent to South America. On their way to South America somebody found out the trade name of those goods and went and filed that trade name in the South American country, and when the American goods reached the South American port they were stopped from entering the country, and it was not until after our State Department had made very strong representations that those goods were permitted to enter that South American country.

Another thing is the item of expense to American manufacturers and merchants. Under the present system it costs an American manufacturer who desires to register his trade-mark in South American countries about $600 to do so. Under this bill that expense will be reduced to $50; that is, the American manufacturer, instead of having to go to Paraguay, Uruguay, Brazil, and the other South American countries to file his registration, will simply file it with the registration bureau, and that will give it immediate registration in the other countries of South America. Under the present law he must make his round to every one of the different countries. The passage of this law will stop pirating in another way, because in some South American countries an American manufacturer registers a trade-mark, and then some one else goes and registers that same trade-mark in another South American country and deprives the rightful owner of the use of it. If a man is not quick in going from one country to another, he may find that his trade-mark good in one place is not good in another place. But under this proposed law, when he files his registration with the registration bureau, immediately in all South American countries coming within the convention his trade-mark will be registered and his rights will be protected.

Now, with reference to what the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] said as to the Patent Office, I believe we ought to go into this matter carefully. There are copyists in the Patent Office receiving only $700 a year, and their work nets the Government only 10 cents a folio for copying patents and other matters in the bureau. You will readily see that 10 cents a folio is below the prevailing rate, and that $700 a year is far below the compensation paid for similar service in other bureaus of the Government. By increasing the copying fee 5 cents a folio we can add about $50,000 a year to the revenues of the Patent Office. With this $50,000 we can meet a part of the necessary increase that should be made in salaries in the Patent Office. Then by the changing of the fee for an application for a patent from $15 to $20, and reducing the fee for the final issuance of a patent from $20 to $15, we can secure an additional $400,000 a year for the Patent Office, as I am informed, and I believe that without additional expense to the Government we can well properly pay the people who are now performing the work in the Patent Office.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MacCRATE. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Does the gentleman consider that that would be a fair division of the total cost of obtaining a patent so far as the service rendered is concerned—fairer than the present division?

Mr. MACCRATE. That is as I understand it from the Commissioner of Patents. The work on the original application, requiring a great deal of searching and other things, ought to be a little more expensive than the final issuance of the patent itself. A great many applications are made where patents are never issued, and if the fee for the preliminary application is made $20, it would increase the revenues without unduly burdening the men who are interested in obtaining patents. By transferring this $5 from the final fee to the preliminary fee the total expense in cases where patents are issued will be no greater than it is now.

Now, if I may proceed out of order for a moment, it has occurred to me that in considering all classes of soldier legislation, and bonus legislation, the question where the money shall come from is one that affects the country. As was stated by my colleague [Mr. MACGREGOR] a few minutes ago, the sum of $9,000,000,000 of American money was advanced to the Allies, on which there is an annual interest charge of about $415,000,000. If a bill can be drafted for the application of a little more than one-ninth of this amount and the interest for four years, we can easily meet the financial requirements of some of the legislation that has been suggested.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But the gentleman is aware of the fact, is he not, that the policy of the present Treasury Department is not to receive any of this interest at all?

Mr. MACCRATE. That may be the policy, but I do not believe it is the correct policy.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And that the President stated in a message he delivered here to this House that the administration would regard it as a dangerous proposition for any money to be sent to us now by the Allies; that is, for any gold to be shipped to this country. Therefore we are receiving nothing.

Mr. MACCRATE. We are not in any way in danger of losing the good will of our allies if we let them understand that, although we grant extension of time for payment, we expect they will pay the principal and the interest of the moneys advanced by the American people in the way of loans for war purposes.

On the other hand, the American people will not suffer unduly and taxpayers will not complain greatly if a part of the money which they have thus far advanced and paid for war purposes is used for one such purpose—that is, for the payment, not as a measure of their service but as a token of our gratitude, to the men who sprung to the support of the Nation in its hour of need.

I throw this out as a suggestion to the committee dealing with the legislation to see if it is not a workable plan whereby bonds could be issued and redeemed as the Allies pay the principal and interest on these loans.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman realizes that that is not a matter for Congress. Congress has not the power as things stand now. Under the claim of the Treasury Department they have the right to postpone the collection of the interest indefinitely. The Treasury Department, in other words, claims that under the law authorizing the loans to the Allies, it has the power to postpone the payment of the interest indefinitely, and acting under legislative authority they are postponing all collections of any interest from any debts due from the Allies. We are receiving nothing in the way of interest.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACCRATE. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. In reply to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the Treasury Department operates under the law and nothing else, and that Congress can change any law that exists in this Nation to-day. If the law under which the Treasury Department is acting is not a proper law, Congress can change it to-morrow.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Unquestionably.

Mr. BLANTON. Then this Congress is responsible and not the Treasury Department.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is the gentleman from Texas in favor of changing the law?

Mr. BLANTON. I am in favor of every country that owes the United States paying its debts promptly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman is not in accord with the administration.

Mr. BLANTON. I will vote, if the gentleman will bring in a rule from the Committee on Rules, to require those countries to pay the interest on their debt.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACCRATE. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that Secretary Glass addressed a letter to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. FORDNEY, in which he stated that it was the opinion of the Treasury Department that they had the right, without further legislation, to extend the interest payments, but if the Committee on Ways and Means thought otherwise he wanted them to so indicate.

Mr. MACCRATE. The time has come when this Congress must say plainly and unmistakably that it will pass additional legislation in favor of the service men.

If we delay action, our motives may be misunderstood. We may be sure that condemnation will be heaped on any party which attempts to make political capital of soldier legislation.

The good will of men who have gone fearlessly into the valley of death to preserve the Nation's life can not be bought by a bond or a farm or a home, for they know what service to the Nation means and their good will will go to that party which best meets their standard of national service. Let us speedily determine what we should do and then let us do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired. If there is no time desired in opposition, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That any person who shall willfully and with intent to deceive, affix, apply, or annex, or use in connection with any article or articles of merchandise, or any container or containers of the same, a false designation of origin, including words or other symbols tending to falsely identify the origin of the merchandise, and shall then cause such merchandise to enter into interstate or foreign commerce, and any person who shall knowingly transport such merchandise or cause or procure the same to be transported in interstate or foreign commerce or commerce with Indian tribes, or shall knowingly deliver the same to any carrier to be so transported, shall be liable to an action at law for damages and to an action in equity for an injunction, at the suit of any person, firm, or corporation doing business in the locality falsely indicated as that of origin, or in the region in which said locality is situated, or at the suit of any association of such persons, firms, or corporations.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 5, after the word "knowingly," strike out the words "transport such merchandise or."

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, the committee has no objection to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division just to check up.

The question was taken, and there were 35 ayes and no noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That written or printed copies of any records, books, papers, or drawings belonging to the Patent Office and relating to trade-marks placed on the register provided for by this act, when authenticated by the seal of the Patent Office and certified by the commissioner thereof, shall be evidence in all cases wherein the originals could be evidence, and any person making application therefor and paying the fee required by law shall have certified copies thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. On line 5, page 5, there is an error in spelling the word "certified." Without objection, the Clerk will make the correction.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

On filing an appeal to the Commissioner of Patents from the decision of the examiner in charge of interferences, awarding ownership of a trade-mark, canceling or refusing to cancel the registration of a trade-mark, a fee of $15 shall be payable.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In reference to the last paragraph, does that mean that the fee is to be payable for all appeals to the Commissioner of Patents from the decisions of the examiners under the provisions of this act, or is it in all cases? This fixes a fee for filing the appeal from the examiner in charge of interferences. I wondered whether that was fixing a new fee outside of the scope of this act.

Mr. NOLAN. No; the law provides now as to fees both in patents and trade-mark cases. The registration only applies to this act. The registration of a trade-mark in the Patent Office does not give the registrant any advantage until finally approved.

Mr. WALSH. It seemed to me that there ought to be in there somewhere the words "on filing an appeal under the provisions of this act."

Mr. NOLAN. I think perhaps that amendment ought to be made.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: After the word "appeal," line 15, page 5, insert the words "under this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 15, after the word "appeal," insert the words "under this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise, report the bill to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRAMTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 9023, and had directed him to report the same back with certain amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and (on a division, demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 65, noes 3.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. NOLAN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from California any further business from the Committee on Patents?

Mr. NOLAN. Nothing further.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll of committees.

HONORABLY DISCHARGED SOLDIERS.

The Clerk called the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 11449) providing that any person who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during any war, who was killed in action, or died of wounds incurred or disease contracted in such service, shall be deemed to have been honorably discharged from such service, and to give pensionable status to the widow or former widow of any such person.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois calls up the bill H. R. 11449, and under the rule the House will resolve itself automatically into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] will take the chair.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. It has been ruled that that can not be done on Calendar Wednesday. The House must resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 11449, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That every person who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during any war, who was killed in action, or died of wounds incurred or disease contracted in such service, shall be deemed to have been honorably discharged from such service; and any widow or former widow of such person shall be entitled to be paid a pension at the same rate as is paid to widows or former widows of soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in any such war for 90 days or more and were honorably discharged therefrom: Provided, That no pension under any general or special act shall be reduced by anything in this act contained.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule there are two hours of general debate to be confined to the bill. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for one hour.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to take more than a moment in explaining this bill. Under all recent legislation widows' pensions are based on the service of the soldier for 90 days or more and an honorable discharge. The occasion for introducing this bill is a decision of the Pension Bureau or the Department of the Interior that a widow whose soldier husband died in the service of his country can not receive a pension under the act of September 8, 1916, because the soldier has not been honorably discharged technically. It seems to me that a man who was killed or who dies in the service of his country should be considered to be honorably discharged and that the widow should have a pensionable status as well as widows of those who served for 90 days or more. That is all there is in the bill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. This provides that anyone killed during any war shall be so considered. Would not that give the widows of the soldiers killed in the late war a further pensionable status in addition to what is provided under the war-risk act?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. I do not think so. The last clause of the bill I think would cover that. It provides simply that the widows of soldiers who died in the service shall be pensionable the same as the widows of those who served for 90 days or more, as provided under existing law. The widows of the soldiers of the late war are not pensioned. They receive compensation.

Mr. WALSH. Of course there is a pension, and we will be legislating to that effect before long. It is called compensation now, but it is under a law which gives them certain benefits. I was wondering if they are receiving that benefit whether under this law they might not come in for additional benefits.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. The law already provides that they can receive but one pension, and it is held by the Pension Bureau that a widow or anyone receiving compensation from the Pension Bureau can not at the same time receive a pension.

Mr. WALSH. Suppose she is receiving compensation from the War Risk Bureau?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. It would not make any difference. That fact would be ascertained before the application for the pension is acted upon by the pension officials.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I received a letter this morning stating that compensation would be allowed either to a soldier or the widow of a soldier, even if a pension were drawn by the one who has applied for compensation.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. I think that has been the ruling of the War Risk Bureau, while the Bureau of Pensions rules otherwise.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether this law would in his opinion apply to this case: Take a soldier who enlisted in the Civil War and who deserted from that enlistment, who then reenlisted soon thereafter and served out the balance of the enlistment and thereafter died of wounds or sickness contracted in the service. Would the widow of such a man receive the pension by virtue of this proposed law?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. I think she would.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. SANFORD. I have a somewhat lengthy statement, but the gentleman has time enough. In the work on the Military Committee, the subcommittee on desertions has found quite a few cases which seem to me ought to be considered by the gentleman's committee. Yesterday the subcommittee had a case which I think should be included in this bill. The applicant was the widow of a soldier who was honorably discharged, as appeared by the records of the War Department, and who at the time of his death was drawing a pension, but when the widow applied for a pension the Pension Bureau looked up his record and found a record of a court-martial proceeding against him in 1865, and although for 20 years he drew a pension, yet because of the record of the court-martial they refused a pension to the widow. Our committee would be expected to pass favorably on such a case, and I am sure the House would pass favorably upon it. The court-martial offense was trivial, away back in 1865, but that mark against her husband, who himself did not suffer from it all his life, is now brought up to keep the widow from getting a pension, and for eight years she has been trying to get consideration at the hands of Congress.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. The Committee on Invalid Pensions has had under consideration a bill that would cover precisely those cases, and I have just received a communication from the Commissioner of Pensions indorsing the bill, and I think it will be passed.

Mr. SANFORD. It seems to me it would be a good time to pass it now, and it seems to me that all that would be necessary would be to offer an amendment after the word "service," in line 6, as follows: "or who at the time of his death was drawing pension for such service."

In other words, the pensionable status of the husband should cover the question of service as far as the widow is concerned, it seems to me.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. It seems to me that the bill is broad enough to cover the case.

Mr. SANFORD. I think not, and I have examined it for that purpose. In the case I have in mind the soldier was wounded. In order to bring the widow under this bill it will be necessary to show that he died of his wounds. If the gentleman will accept my amendment, I will try to get it into form.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. I will accept the amendment if the gentleman will draw it.

Mr. HULINGS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. HULINGS. Under the law at present if a soldier has been court-martialed and the sentence of the court is anything short of dishonorable discharge does that in any way affect his right to a pension?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. I do not think it would under existing law. I do not think that a case would lie at all.

Mr. Chairman, if any gentleman desires time, I will yield.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MCKENZIE, having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to bills of the following titles:

S. 2476. An act to amend the act establishing the eastern district of Kentucky; and

S. 3427. An act to establish a commission to report to Congress on the practicability, feasibility, and place, and to devise plans for the construction of a public bridge over the Niagara River from some point in the city of Buffalo, N. Y., to some point in the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3076) authorizing suits against the United States in admiralty, suits for salvage services, and providing for the release of merchant vessels belonging to the United States from arrest and attachment in foreign jurisdictions, and for other purposes, had requested a conference with the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JONES of Washington, Mr. MCNARY, and Mr. SIMMONS as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3371) authorizing Gordon N. Peay, jr., his heirs and assigns to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge and approaches thereto across the White River, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CALDER, Mr. EDGE, and Mr. KIRBY as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

An act (S. 3331) granting the consent of Congress to the Interstate Construction Corporation to construct a bridge across the Columbia River, between the States of Oregon and Washington, at or within two miles westerly from Cascade Locks, in the State of Oregon, and granting a license to construct and maintain the approach to said bridge over property belonging to the Government of the United States.

The message also announced that in accordance with the provisions of the concurrent resolution of January 15, 1920, providing for a commission of Congress to visit the Virgin Islands the Vice President had appointed Mr. KENYON, Mr. EDGE, and Mr. GAY as members on the part of the Senate.

HONORABLY DISCHARGED SOLDIERS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the bill, and I ask recognition in opposition to it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions who is opposed to the bill and claims recognition? If not, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the point raised by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], who is one of the ablest lawyers in this House, is a good point in my judgment, regardless of the opinion of the chairman. There can be no question but that under the terms of this bill the widow of every soldier in the late war, notwithstanding the fact that she now may be drawing her $10,000 of insurance, which was provided by Congress to take care of the ordinary pensionable status that otherwise should properly attach to such death, and notwithstanding the fact that in addition to the $10,000 insurance she may now be drawing the additional compensaion from the War Risk Bureau, based upon dependency, that is provided for in another feature of that law, in addition to both of such monthly remittances she is now receiving, she will yet be pensionable under the terms of this bill. Because her husband died in a war or died from wounds inflicted in this war, what takes her out of the terms of this bill? I ask the chairman to point us to the provision of this bill that exempts her from its terms?

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. DOWELL. You would not want to deprive the widow of receiving the insurance money, would you?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no; I want her to receive it.

Mr. DOWELL. But he paid for that, just the same as if he were in civil life.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman surely does not believe that.

Mr. DOWELL. He paid for the insurance, certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is too good a business man, he is too intelligent, he has too much knowledge concerning the insurance business of this country, to believe that that was a business transaction between this Government and our soldiers who took out the policies. Why, the gentleman knows that for an insignificant monthly payment, wholly incommensurate with the risk and hazard, this Government provided insurance to men whose hazard no business institution of the country anywhere or in any of the civilized nations of the world would have accepted for any kind of a premium. The gentleman knows that. It was more of a gift, it was more of a gratuity, on the part of this Government, to our splendid soldiers who risked their lives in the trenches of France.

But I want to get some information. The chairman of the committee in reply to the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts said that these widows would not draw a pension under this bill. Now, I ask him if he can show me the provision in this law that exempts them?

Mr. HULINGS. Will the gentleman from Texas permit a question?

Mr. BLANTON. I will.

Mr. HULINGS. Suppose a man who has been a good soldier during the Civil War——

Mr. BLANTON. Let us get away from the Civil War now and get down to the more recent war.

Mr. HULINGS. Suppose he dies, leaving a widow, and under our pension laws he has been entitled to $12 a month—recently increased to $25—and the widow has a son that went into the recent service, and he bought insurance, and entered into a contract with the Government——

Mr. BLANTON. I anticipate the gentleman. She ought to draw the Civil War pension, and ought also to draw her insurance, and ought to draw the compensation, if she were dependent, because she lost her husband in the Civil War and she lost her son in the late war with Germany. She ought to draw it all.

Mr. HULINGS. In that case, why are you against the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Because my good friend's illustration doesn't apply. This bill is brought here under the statement of the chairman that it does not apply to the widows who lost their husbands in the late war against Germany.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I will.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. In order to avoid any question about that, I will offer an amendment providing that no widow who receives compensation on account of service in the late war shall be pensionable under this act.

Mr. BLANTON. I feel grateful to the chairman for such assurance. The bill as drawn says "any war." It takes in the late war with Germany as well as the Spanish-American War, as well as the Civil War, as well as the Mexican War, and as well as any war of conflict with which this country has ever been afflicted. With such an amendment properly drawn it will get rid of that question.

But I want to call the chairman's attention to another defect in this bill. Say a man did not volunteer in the Civil War to protect his country. And right here I want to say this: My father, as a volunteer, served four years as a Confederate soldier.

I was brought up in an atmosphere that surrounded such a service, and revere, love, and honor the lost cause for which my father bravely fought; but do you suppose I am not glad of the termination of that war in the way it did terminate? Why, as an American citizen, I am now glad of it. [Applause.] Our beloved Republic was preserved and slavery abolished. I am glad of it, although it meant great suffering and enormous financial sacrifice to my family and to the people of my particular section of the country and the fair Southland. But I am an American citizen; and I believe that if my father were alive—my father, who voluntarily served four years his cause conscientiously and lost—he would be glad that I have that kind of spirit of Americanism in me now.

But I want to say this: Suppose you find a man who had been drafted into the service of his country to protect his flag—not volunteered, but drafted into the service—and incidentally he got sick or was wounded, superficially or otherwise, and then he deserted at the first opportunity. Instead of fighting for his flag, instead of rendering service—patriotic service—to his country, he deserted and slunk around for months hiding. Then when the war was over, why, possibly, he died from those wounds not voluntarily received in the service for his country, or died from some disease contracted, possibly, in the service and in his hiding. Under the provisions of this bill his widow could come in here now and claim a pension from this Government.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, yes. Why not? This bill gives him an honorable discharge. He does not have to have an honorable discharge under this bill. Read it. This bill itself is, ipso facto, an honorable discharge in just such a case as I have mentioned, because it says that "if he died from wounds received while in the service of his country or if he died from disease contracted while in the service of his country," regardless of how or when it was contracted, regardless of how long he was a soldier serving his flag, or whether thereafter he was a slinking deserter, yet his widow could come in at this late hour, after half a century has passed, and have the United States Government pay her a pension of at least $25 a month.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. BLANTON. Gladly.

Mr. LAYTON. Does it not say that he shall be deemed to have been honorably discharged?

Mr. BLANTON. That is the law that you are asking us to pass—that we shall deem him to be honorably discharged, regardless of his having been a deserter, even if he was a deserter, even though the wound he received was received while he was not voluntarily serving his country, even though the disease he contracted was not contracted while he was voluntarily serving, but was contracted when he had an intention in his heart to desert at the first moment, though at the time serving under leash, and did desert, and did thereafter slink away from the officers of the law who were seeking to bring him back into the service. It is to such a man as that that we give, under the terms of this bill, an honorable discharge; and it is to the widow of such a man that we pay a pension of at least $25 a month.

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. RICKETTS. Would not the records of the War Department show whether the man had deserted and whether he was killed in the service? That is the intention of this bill. Let the gentleman go to the War Department and ask The Adjutant General to give him the service of any soldier of the Civil War. If he was a deserter, the record would show it.

This bill does not undertake to establish an honorable discharge for a deserter, or to give him an honorable discharge. This is to provide for the widow or dependents of the man who lost his life on the field of battle or in the service of his country, and where the record shows he died in battle. The chairman of this committee has an opinion by the Commissioner of Pensions, where he has held up a widow's claim for pension on the theory that the man was killed in battle, in the service of his country, and never was discharged, and consequently she can never get a pension. That is the purpose of this bill—to cure that defect.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I have become discouraged in the efforts I have made here to keep at least a few of my Republican colleagues on the floor of the House, because the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. RICKETTS], who has just interrupted me, is the only one of my Republican colleagues who in the last session of Congress missed not a single roll call. He has been here all the time—that is, when roll calls are going on, at least—but it has not seemed to have done him much good, because being here at this time, with a small bill like this in front of him, written in the English language, he does not seem to be able to understand what it means, and he does not seem to be able to apply it to the facts of any particular case that could come within its provisions.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In one moment. Let me answer my friend from Ohio first.

What does this bill provide? It provides that the widow of any man who was in the service of the United States in any war—whether it was service for one minute, five minutes, or a day, or a week, or a month, it matters not—any service for any time in the United States during any war——

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. BLANTON. I have not answered the gentleman yet.

Mr. RICKETTS. The gentleman wants to be fair, does he not?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. RICKETTS. Why does not the gentleman quote the bill, then?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield now until I fully answer the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BLANTON. That is what the bill provides. It says that, when you find such a widow, this law that we are called upon to pass now is to grant ipso facto to her soldier husband an honorable discharge and place the widow in the pensionable class, to draw at least $25 a month from this Government——

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment. I want to answer the gentleman from Ohio before I quit—if her husband died from wounds received or disease contracted while in the service, and this, too, regardless of the length of time he served, or of whether he deliberately deserted thereafter. Here you may have a man who was drafted in the Army of the United States during the Civil War, who did not volunteer. He did not come in willingly. He did not have a spark of patriotism in his bosom. He did not want to serve, but he was drafted into the Army during the Civil War and made to serve. This drafted man is taken to camp. He had an intention right then and there to desert at the first opportunity. In a possible effort to find a way of deserting, he is out in the cold some night and contracts a cold, and probably it is followed by pneumonia or something, and probably by other complications that develop a chronic disease in his system; or he is possibly forced out on the line, and in a week's time receives some kind of wound. Then, with less than a week's service—it could so happen—he deserts his Army, he deserts his country and his flag, and flees in hiding; he has not got a spark of patriotism in his bosom; and then he hides out for months and months and months in the mountain fastnesses and in the swamps; then years after dies from the alleged result of said wound or said disease——

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BLANTON. Just a moment. I am going to fully answer the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. RICKETTS] if it takes a week. I ask the chairman of this committee what would keep that man's widow from coming within the pensionable status of this bill? Tell me why under the loose provisions of this bill that man's widow would not draw a pension if he died from that disease in that kind of service, or if he died from the result of a wound received in that kind of service? A deserter, yet wounded in or diseased by service? Yet a deserter! The chairman does not answer, but I know my distinguished lawyer friend from Massachusetts must agree with me that that is a legal construction of this bill applicable to a possible state of facts. Now, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio for a minute, if I have done him an injustice.

Mr. RICKETTS. Well, the gentleman has. The bill provides—

That every person who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during any war, who was killed in action, or died of wounds incurred or disease contracted in such service, shall be deemed to have been honorably discharged from such service.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. RICKETTS. He must have been in the service, and if he was a deserter he was not in the service, and consequently the gentleman's argument falls flat. Did I understand the gentleman to say that any man who was drafted to serve his country had not a spark of patriotism in his bosom?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no; I did not say anything like that.

Mr. RICKETTS. What did the gentleman say about that?

Mr. BLANTON. I will tell you if you will just be seated. In the first place, a man could come within the provisions of the bill quoted and yet be a deserter. If a man was drafted into service, even though when he was drafted he might have had the intention then and there to desert at the first opportunity, yet if he was drafted into the service and sent to camp and served a week or a day or 10 hours after being drafted and then deserted, he was, nevertheless, in the service of the United States and comes within the provisions of this bill, and you can not get away from that.

Mr. VAILE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; but first I want to fully answer the gentleman from Ohio. What I said about a drafted man was purely a possible hypothetical case that could arise in this country or might have existed during the Civil War and come within the provisions of this bill. It had no reference to the many loyal, patriotic men, even in that war, who were drafted. It had no reference to the splendid young soldiers of America who were drafted in the recent war and who loyally served their country.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment. I am going to answer the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. RICKETTS] if it takes all my hour. Then I am going to yield first to my friend from Colorado [Mr. VAILE]. Now, does the gentleman from Ohio get this fact, that if a man who was drafted into that Army, served an hour or a day or a week, and then deserted, he was in the service?

Mr. RICKETTS. He was in the service as long as he stayed in it.

Mr. BLANTON. But suppose he afterwards deserted?

Mr. RICKETTS. Then he was out of the service.

Mr. BLANTON. But he had served in a war, had not he?

Mr. RICKETTS. Oh, yes; but he was not wounded.

Mr. BLANTON. But suppose he was wounded during that hour or that day or that week of forced service. This bill makes no distinction.

Mr. RICKETTS. He would not be a deserter if he was killed in the service and went out of it in that honorable way.

Mr. BLANTON. But suppose after being drafted——

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. GARD. It is certainly not in the interest of decorum that there should be colloquy between gentlemen in the way this is going on—one standing and one sitting.

Mr. BLANTON. I am not responsible for the gentleman from Ohio remaining in his seat.

The CHAIRMAN. When a gentleman interrupts he must rise and obtain the permission of the Chair.

Mr. RICKETTS. I hope my colleague from Ohio [Mr. GARD] will observe what actually happened. I did not interrupt the gentleman by asking him a question. He came over and asked me a question.

Mr. BLANTON. My hearing must have been at fault. I was under the impression that the gentleman asked me several questions.

Mr. RICKETTS. When I was sitting down the gentleman asked me a question.

Mr. BLANTON. I had no way of compelling the gentleman to rise to answer me. I had to leave that to his own discretion and courtesy.

Mr. RICKETTS. The gentleman does not owe me any apology. He owes his apology to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

Mr. BLANTON. I take it I have answered the gentleman, that if a man who was drafted into the service during the Civil War served an hour or a day or a week, and during that short service he was wounded or contracted a disease from either of which later on in life he died, that man was in the service of the United States in a war, and even though he became a deserter, he comes within the provisions of this bill, which gives him an undeserved honorable discharge and which gives his widow a pensionable status, and thus rewards desertion. Now, I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. VAILE. I think I appreciate the point which the gentleman is arguing so ably, but let me suggest this: Desertion fixes a legal status. It constitutes a dishonorable separation from the Army. It is an affirmative act constituting a dishonorable separation.

Mr. BLANTON. Under the existing law that is true.

Mr. VAILE. Exactly.

Mr. BLANTON. But when we pass this bill we change the present law and give that man an honorable discharge regardless of his subsequent desertion.

Mr. VAILE. If the gentleman from Texas was on the bench deciding the question as to whether a man who by his own unpatriotic act had acquired the status of a dishonorably discharged soldier he would decide that no subsequent legislation of a general character designed to reach the cases of men killed in action or who died as the result of wounds or disease contracted in the service, could affect that man's status. It seems to me that where a man has acquired the distinct legal status of a dishonorably discharged soldier that would not be affected by this bill which is general in its terms.

Mr. BLANTON. Now, I will answer the gentleman. Under the existing law any man who deserted his country is not entitled to a pensionable status, and that ought to be the law and it ought to remain the law. But read this bill. It is easily understood. It is a short bill in plain, simple English. Its provisions mean that if any man ever did any service for this country in any war, regardless of whether he deserted or not, there is no exemption made with regard to desertion, and he dies from wounds or disease contracted while in the service his widow is paid a pension, notwithstanding the fact that before the war closed this man became a deserter and hid out from service. You can not get away from this construction of the bill, gentlemen, and if it is passed in its present form some widows of deserters will be paid pensions.

Now, the gentleman asks what would I do if I were on the bench construing the bill.

Mr. VAILE. In the case as presented where the widow of a soldier is the widow of one who by his own act acquired a definite legal status, with all the disabilities of a discharged soldier.

Mr. BLANTON. If I were on the bench I would carry out the law whether it conformed to my own ideas or not.

Mr. VAILE. We know that the gentleman would do that anyway.

Mr. BLANTON. When I was on the bench at one time in my life the law of the State of Texas provided that in order to introduce a deed to a man's home, to prove his title in some cases, he must file it among the papers of the case three days before the trial commenced and give the opposite counsel notice of that filing. Otherwise you could not introduce such deed in evidence. Such a case as that came up in my court, where one shrewd lawyer was trying to take advantage of a less-informed young lawyer. A man's home was involved and the roof that covered and sheltered the heads of his wife and children was the stake. It was my duty under the law not to admit his deed in evidence and to let a scoundrel take his property. I had to hold that he could not offer his deed. But I will tell you what I did do, my good friend from Colorado, I took the bit in my mouth and I said that all announcements in this case are withdrawn and the case is continued until the next term of court for trial.

Mr. VAILE. And I have no doubt that gentleman will find some equally simple and reasonable way of settling the difficulty that I have suggested. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. No; you could not do it, because the Pension Department does not sit as a judge. It sits to carry out the will of this Congress expressed in laws, and it is our duty to pass proper laws. If this bill does mean what I say it means, and no good lawyer in this House can escape the legal point I have made—if it does mean what I say, do you want to give that class of widows a pensionable status? If you do, vote for it; that is all. The distinguished chairman of the committee has admitted that the first point I made is good and has admitted that he will offer an amendment to cure it. If the second point is good, why not offer an amendment to cure that. I do not care to take up further time of the House, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen. I have taken what time I have in a zealous effort to discharge my duty as a Representative of the people of this country, and I yield the floor.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEE]. I see, however, that he is not just at present in the Chamber.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time. I want to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. SMALL. Will the gentleman yield to me to make a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. BLACK. Certainly.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KEARNS. When the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] left the floor he yielded the floor. Later on he reserved his time, and I want to know if that can be done; not that I have any objection, but I want to know as a matter of parliamentary practice.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I was not aware that any other gentleman wanted to speak.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair's recollection is that when the gentleman left the floor he yielded the floor. No one made any claim for further time, and then the gentleman renewed the request that he be allowed to reserve the balance of his time and yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK], and no objection was made.

Mr. KEARNS. I have no objection, I merely rose as a matter of information—whether a Member could yield the floor and then later on take it back and reserve the balance of his time.

The CHAIRMAN. There was no objection made to it at the time, and the Chair could have again recognized the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee [Mr. FULLER] about the language of the bill. I notice that the language of the bill provides that a soldier, sailor, or marine killed in action shall be deemed to be honorably discharged from the service. Is that not the law at the present time? If a soldier is killed in action, is he not deemed to have an honorable discharge by the very fact of his death?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Not under the recent pension legislation. It requires the service of 90 days and an honorable discharge from such service.

Mr. BLACK. Does the gentleman mean to say that under the pension act if a soldier of the Civil War had enlisted on the 1st of April and was killed during that month that his widow would not have a pensionable status under the act the gentleman speaks of?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Not under the act of September 8, 1916. The report contains a copy of the opinion of the Pension Bureau denying pension to a widow whose soldier husband died in the service, and therefore was not discharged.

Mr. BLACK. In another part of the bill it provides that this pension shall be paid to the widow or a former widow of such person. If that widow had remarried, I presume as long as the second marriage relation exists she would not be held to be a former widow?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Certainly not.

Mr. BLACK. Of course, if she should be divorced from that soldier or he should subsequently die, she would become the former widow of the soldier.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. That would bring her under the provisions of the Ashbrook law.

Mr. BLACK. That is the construction of that law as now interpreted by the Pension Department?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. I yield back the rest of my time.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. GARD. I am interested in having the benefit of the gentleman's opinion regarding this bill. Manifestly it would seem to me that a soldier in any war in defense of the Union, who was killed in action or who died of wounds incurred or disease contracted in the line of service, would be an honorably discharged Union soldier. It is the gentleman's contention that the Bureau of Pensions has held that under the act of September 8, 1916, unless there be 90 days' actual service, there is no pensionable status?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. And a technical discharge.

Mr. GARD. Let me call the gentleman's attention to a case which I have in mind, if the gentleman has time to enlighten me. A man was a member of the United States Army, on his second enlistment, and was sent into the Battle of San Juan as a member of the Regular Army on second enlistment. He was shot in the foot and in the thigh on, say, July 1 or 2 in 1898. He was not discharged from the Regular Army until January, 1899, when he was discharged for medical disability. There was a ruling from this same department, under this law, I apprehend, that he had no pensionable status, nor had his minor children a pensionable status, because it was held that he had not served actually 90 days in what they termed "active service." The point I have in mind is this: Where one is injured in the service and is confined in a hospital because of gunshot wounds received in action, does not that constitute active service?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. I should think so.

Mr. GARD. This soldier of the Spanish-American War, on second enlistment, Regular Army man, was wounded and compelled to retire from active service before he had served on this second enlistment actually 90 days. He was not discharged until some six months after that, and then was discharged for medical disability, but the contention of the examining board was that he had not served 90 days' active service at the time he received the wounds which made his absence necessary from the firing line. Is there anything in this bill which would correct such a state of affairs?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. The gentleman could form an opinion on that as well as I. I do not know.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. VAILE. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] that I think he will find that arises from what seems to some of an injustice in the pension law, providing that in case of Regulars their service must have been 90 days' active service, which is construed by the Pension Department to have been service at the scene of action in the Spanish War. I have a bill pending which I have introduced which seeks to correct that.

Mr. GARD. That is unquestionably a defect, because it seems to me that if a man is injured in the service and is compelled to retire from the fighting front and go to a hospital for 60 or 80 days, that certainly should be construed as being military service, because he is absent from the conflict through the injury that he received in action.

Mr. VAILE. That is a very glaring case of it. I contend that if he was in the United States, and never could have been at the Battle of San Juan at all, he should have a pensionable status.

Mr. GARD. I have not had the privilege of seeing the gentleman's bill, but it seems to me that there is a manifest injustice about the right of the Regular Establishment of the Army of the United States in the case I have cited.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. It is very difficult to cover all of those cases in one bill. If the gentleman can suggest any amendment, I do not know but that it might be agreeable.

Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the bill for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That every person who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during any war, who was killed in action, or died of wounds incurred or disease contracted in such service shall be deemed to have been honorably discharged from such service; and any widow or former widow of such person shall be entitled to be paid a pension at the same rate as is paid to widows or former widows of soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in any such war for 90 days or more and were honorably discharged therefrom: Provided, That no pension under any general or special act shall be reduced by anything in this act contained.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 1, line 4, by inserting the words "prior to April 6, 1917," after the word "war."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "war," insert "prior to April 6, 1917."

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the bill. I tried to get recognition of the Chair before the chairman of the committee was recognized. I make the point of order against the bill on the ground that it is reported out by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, which has no jurisdiction except upon Civil War pensions, and this bill undertakes to cover pensions in other wars.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order that the point comes too late, debate having ensued on the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill which embodies some features over which this committee has jurisdiction. That being true, the Members of the House are not supposed to know the contents of the bill until they have heard it read. There was no opportunity to make the point until we knew the contents of the bill. I think the same question has arisen before, at which time a decision was rendered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS], who was presiding. The point was made that the point of order came too late, but the Chair at that time held that it was a point that could be made even after the bill was read and had been debated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Texas if he wishes to be heard on his point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the rules and precedents of the House clearly provide that no point of order against an entire bill is good where debate on the bill against which the point of order has been made has been had. This is likewise true as to a section of a bill, where debate has been on the section before the point of order has been lodged against it. That is a rule which is well recognized by the House, and I think it has been so decided by the present occupant of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FULLER] on the point of order.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, in my opinion, the point of order comes too late, if it were made. I do not think it is good in this particular case. If of this bill the Committee on Invalid Pensions does not have jurisdiction, I do not know what committee would have. The bill relates more particularly to the Civil War than to any other war. The cases referred to in the report are Civil War cases. I do not know whether there are other cases or not, but I presume there might be. Certainly as to so much of the bill as has reference to the Civil War, the Committee on Invalid Pensions has jurisdiction. The bill, of course, goes further than that, but no other committee would have exclusive jurisdiction of this bill. The other Committee on Pensions has jurisdiction only of cases other than the Civil War.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state further that the jurisdictional question must be raised at the time the bill is taken up for consideration. In other words, this bill could come from any committee, even that which has lately been denominated as the "Spare Rib Committee," and if no objection was raised against it, the point of order would come too late after debate thereon. And I call the attention of the Chair further to the precedent again established during the consideration of the railroad bill, when what is known as the Anderson substitute was under consideration. I made a point of order against the substitute, and the Chair held at that time that because debate had ensued upon the substitute before point of order was made, the point of order came too late. That has been the uniform ruling of the House for several years.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the Chair is entertaining this point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is hearing arguments on the point of order, and will hear the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. With reference to the point of order raised by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], I wish to say that of course everyone agrees that after debate has begun it is then too late to raise a question of order, provided, of course, that the following state of facts does not exist, namely, that a Member at the time was seeking to make the point of order, was on his feet, and doing his best to secure the attention of the Chair. If a Member was making this effort, and was inadvertently overlooked by the Chair, then I undertake to say, that under such circumstances the presiding officers have not been in haste to exclude the question of order. That is precisely as I understand this situation to be.

Mr. BLANTON. No, Mr. Chairman, because the distinguished chairman of the committee was recognized for an hour and used most of his hour. I was recognized for an hour, and I used a great portion of such time. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] was recognized for five minutes, and used his time, and never during any of such long debate did the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] ask recognition to make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has stated the facts so far as the observation of the Chair is concerned.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I understand that what has been stated as to general debate is perfectly true, but I understand further that we are now considering the bill for the purpose of amendment, and this is therefore the first point of time at which the gentleman from Tennessee could raise a question of jurisdiction with respect to certain items in the bill.

I understand that the gentleman from Tennessee was seeking recognition to make his point of order, was on his feet, and the Chair recognized the chairman of the committee, not observing that the gentleman from Tennessee was seeking recognition to make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Tennessee made the point of order against the entire bill because it was reported by a committee that had no jurisdiction over the matter contained in it.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I understand that he is now directing a point of order to those portions of the bill which are in excess of the jurisdiction of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman should proceed to point that out.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I agree that is what he should do. I would like to understand the exact status. If I am under misapprehension as to the facts——

Mr. RANDALL of California. May I suggest to the gentleman that no Member has made the point of order that the Committee on Invalid Pensions had no jurisdiction of the bill while the bill was in the hands of the committee? The committee is in charge of the bill now, and the committee is in the hands of the House.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I understand that very well. Mr. Chairman, if I have the facts correctly in hand, this is a bill which in part contains matter appropriate to the jurisdiction of this committee, and in part contains matter that appropriately belongs to other committees. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] is making a point of order solely to those portions of the bill which are in excess of the jurisdiction of this particular committee, not undertaking, of course, to raise any question of order as to the portions of the bill which the Committee on Invalid Pensions could appropriately consider and report. If that is the situation, if I am correctly advised as to the facts, then I desire to be heard on the point of order to the illegal matter in this bill.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. RUCKER. Suppose the bill were amended so as to make it apply solely to Civil War soldiers, then the Committee on Invalid Pensions would clearly have jurisdiction over it. If the bill had been brought in without the language in it making it applicable to the Spanish-American War soldiers, would it not be competent for this committee to amend the bill and put it in the form in which it is now?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I do not know that I understand the question. If the Committee on Invalid Pensions had brought in a bill which dealt with subject matter belonging to its jurisdiction such a bill could not be amended in order by adding matters not belonging to its jurisdiction, but appropriate to the jurisdiction of other committees.

Mr. RUCKER. Not subject to the jurisdiction, but belonging to the general idea of the bill?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Such additions would not be germane. Matters belonging to and falling within the jurisdiction of one committee could not be germane to matters falling within and belonging to the jurisdiction of another committee.

Mr. RUCKER. That question could be raised in reference to every amendment offered to a bill.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Not at all. I have frequently on this floor seen the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations come upon the floor of the committee, and make a point of order to particular items in bills under consideration on the ground that they belonged to the jurisdiction of his committee. On these contentions he was often sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia when would be a proper time to make objection to the jurisdiction of the committee bringing in this bill?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The proper time to make an objection depends upon the facts. If a bill which, as a whole, does not belong to the jurisdiction of some particular committee, is referred to that committee, and the steps contemplated by the rules to correct a reference are not taken in time, and the bill is reported back to the House, then the question of jurisdiction can not be raised at all.

If an error of reference is made with respect to a public bill, and such error is not corrected pursuant to section 832 of the rules, then the failure to take the course prescribed by this rule will in effect give jurisdiction to the committee receiving the bill. This practice rests upon sound principle. The motion to make the correction may be made by any Member asking unanimous consent, or on motion of the committee claiming jurisdiction, or on the report of the committee to which the bill has been erroneously referred. But if this action is not taken, the Members of the House will be considered to have slept upon their rights, and very appropriately will not be heard later. The opportunity for relief has been afforded by the rules, and if not availed of, the doctrine of estoppel should prevail.

But a different situation is presented when a committee brings into the House a bill containing matter upon which it is competent to act under the rules, and other matter which is in excess of its jurisdiction. The first opportunity to object to such illegal matter is when the bill is under consideration, and the offending section is reached. Suppose a bill is introduced which on the whole belongs to a particular committee, but it contains a measure of illegality, or of material appropriately belonging to another committee. The question of jurisdiction could not be waived under section 832 for the manifest reason that if it was referred to another committee, that committee would be confronted with precisely the same difficulty as the first. The only open course, therefore, upon such a state of facts is to refer the bill to the committee to which on the whole the bill belongs, upon the theory that this committee in its deliberations will purge the bill of the offending matter. Should it fail to do this, and return the bill with the offending matter retained, the opportunity will thereupon be presented to the House for the first time, to exercise its authority to keep its committees within the jurisdictional limits prescribed for the committees. To illustrate further. Suppose a bill should be introduced that in part plainly provided for Civil War veterans, and in other part for Spanish War veterans. That bill might be appropriately referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, nor would a motion lie under section 832 to refer it to the Committee on Pensions, for the manifest reason that on the whole the Committee on Pensions would have no better right to it than the Committee on Invalid Pensions. But should the Committee on Invalid Pensions undertake to report a bill providing first for veterans of the Civil War, and then eo nomine for veterans of the Spanish-American War, it would as to the latter provision be plainly encroaching upon the jurisdiction of the Committee on Pensions. An action in excess of authority is certainly a question of order, and in due course should be reached and corrected by a point of order. The subject matter proper to be dealt with by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, are the pensions of the Civil War. Pensions of all other wars belong to the Committee on Pensions. Committees should not report bills dealing with matters foreign to their jurisdiction and authority. Should they undertake it, this exercise of usurped authority, should be challenged. How can it be challenged until the bill containing the offending matter is under consideration for amendment, and such matter is reached in due course?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes; certainly.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. What committee would?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. In the case supposed, either committee—yours as much as the other committee.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. I agree with that proposition.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. But if in your committee you fail to purge the bill of the matter, not falling within your jurisdiction, and the bill is reported with this illegal content, then the House on a point of order can do what you should have done in the committee, namely eliminate the illegal matter.

That is all for which I am contending. Take another illustration: Suppose a bill appropriate to a committee, is referred to that committee. Later the committee reports the bill with a section added that upon inspection is plainly in excess of its jurisdiction. Is this assumption of authority, this action in contempt of the rules prescribing jurisdiction to go unchallenged? And if this illegality is challenged, how and when may that action be taken, save when the bill is under consideration, and by a point of order to the objectionable matter when it is reached in due course?

This has often been done in this body. As Chairman of the Committee of the Whole I have had to pass on this precise question. On September 19, 1918—see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 10525—the House was in Committee of the Whole considering the revenue bill. Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts made the point of order that a paragraph of the bill did not relate to the revenue or bonded debt of the United States, and therefore was not within the jurisdiction of the committee reporting the bill. The rules of the House limit the jurisdiction of the Committee on Ways and Means, to the revenue, and the bonded debt of the United States. The paragraph complained of did not fall under either head, I ruled and I think correctly, that the point was well taken, and the offending paragraph should be stricken from the bill. The Committee on Roads is empowered to report on matters relating to the construction or maintenance of roads, but not to make an appropriation. Suppose this committee should report a road bill, and undertake to include an appropriation, would the chairman decline to entertain a point of order specifically directed to the appropriation, on the ground that the same was in excess of the jurisdiction of the committee? If the Chair would decline to entertain this point of order then in what way would this undertaking of the Roads Committee to become an appropriating committee be appropriately challenged?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. WINGO. I am not familiar with this controversy. Does the gentleman contend that this committee is acting beyond its jurisdiction?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Not altogether. Some of the matter in the bill, as I understand the facts, is properly under the jurisdiction of the committee.

Mr. WINGO. Then it is your contention that, having some portions of the bill falling within the jurisdiction of the committee that reported it, a point of order on the whole question of jurisdiction could not have been made in the beginning?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes; a point of order on the whole question of jurisdiction could not have been made in the beginning. It could not have been appropriately made for the reason that there was no other committee to which the bill could be more properly referred than to this committee.

Mr. WINGO. Your position is that some portions of the bill do not fall within the jurisdiction of the committee, and the proper time at which to make the point of order against it is when that portion of the bill is reached to which the point of order lies?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Precisely; and I challenge the contention that there is any other time at which it could be done.

This is the reason why, in a proper case for rereference, the motion must be made at the prescribed time. The rules fix the time for this motion. If you do not take advantage of your opportunity, then you have slept on your rights; you are guilty of laches; you have had your day in court. But with respect to a bill that has some particular content in it, not within the jurisdiction of a particular committee, there is no motion you can make when the bill is referred. Therefore you can not be charged with sleeping on your rights, when you raise a question against this illegal content in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Do I understand that the part objected to as not being within the jurisdiction of the committee is a matter that it is contended no committee has jurisdiction of?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. No; the contention is that it is within the jurisdiction of other committees.

Mr. WINGO. I thought the question was raised as to what committee you would send it to.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. No. Suppose this question had been raised in the beginning. Part of the bill belongs to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and part of it to the Committee on Pensions. On the whole the Speaker sends it to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. The Committee on Pensions could not sustain a claim for rereference, for on the whole it has no better claim to the bill, than the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and is no more empowered to deal with the compound subject matter of the bill, than the other committee.

Mr. WINGO. It occurs to me that if that happened in the committee you would not have a question of rereference, but the committee would decide, "While we have jurisdiction over certain portions of the bill, we will absolutely cut out the other portion of the bill, because we have no jurisdiction to consider that subject."

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That is precisely the point I am making—that no point of order can be made at the time of the original reference, and that it must be presumed that the committee in its own deliberations will eliminate that portion of the bill over which it has no jurisdiction. Should it fail to do this, then the House or the Committee of the Whole can act when the bill is reported and under consideration.

Mr. SANFORD. Then would you not have this situation, where the House never could consider matter in a bill if a point of order was made to so much of the bill as would be technically beyond the jurisdiction of the committee having the bill in charge?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Not at all. That particular committee could not act on the offending matter, but the appropriate committee would have jurisdiction. I will illustrate again. The contention that I am making is that the Committee on Invalid Pensions should not include in a bill which it reports matter that belongs to the jurisdiction of the Committee on Military Affairs. The contention that I am making is that the Committee on Invalid Pensions should not include in its bills matter that belongs to the Judiciary Committee. Should it undertake to do this illegal thing, I contend that the House is not powerless to deal with the situation. Why do the rules establish the jurisdiction of the several committees if they may act unrebuked in excess of the prescribed limits? The rules prescribe in detail the jurisdiction of each committee. To what end, if they may pass these boundaries without restraint, or control by the House?

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Under the gentleman's contention we would have this state of facts: There has been a time when the House has authorized the Committee of the Whole to have as much as 12 hours' general debate on a bill, which sometimes takes 3 days. Then, under the gentleman's contention, a Member could come in here and sit quietly by and wait until three days have been consumed in general debate on a bill, and then when the bill was read under the five-minute rule he could get up and make the point of order that the committee reporting the bill did not have jurisdiction of it.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Of course, he can, as to a particular section which does not fall within its jurisdiction.

Mr. BLANTON. And all that time would have been wasted.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Not at all. Let me call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that I have seen him sit here during debate, and later do that very thing after hours of general debate. When the consideration of a bill was almost concluded under the five-minute rule, I have seen him raise a point of order to a section of the bill on the ground that it was not in order, and have it stricken out.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, yes; because it was an appropriation bill, and reservations of all points of order had been made against it when it was introduced on the floor; but if it was any other bill, the time for making the point of order would come when the section was read. Now, this point of order is to the whole bill.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. No; it is not to the whole bill. The chairman of the committee admitted that there was some matter in the bill that did not belong to the jurisdiction of his committee.

Mr. BLANTON. But I understood the gentleman from Tennessee to make a point of order against the whole bill.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I do not so understand the situation. If that is the situation, then I have nothing to say.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield for just one suggestion?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. OSBORNE. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. OSBORNE. I do.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I have not yielded the floor. I simply yielded to the gentleman from Texas for a question.

Mr. BLACK. I recall that in the consideration of an appropriation bill, unless points of order are reserved when the bill is presented to the House you can not make them when the bill is read. I remember one particular case when the Chair held that not having reserved points of order when the bill was reported to the House the points of order were waived, and I was wondering whether the same rule would apply in this particular case.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Not at all. That provision as to reserving points of order applies exclusively to general appropriation bills. There is no reason in principle why the requirement should apply to these bills, but such is the practice. The gentleman will find on looking to section 6926 of Volume V of Hinds' Precedents that Mr. Speaker CANNON ruled upon a motion to go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Union Calendar from the District of Columbia, that it was not necessary to reserve points of order, as the bills in question were not general appropriation bills. To the same effect see section 6924. But in the latter case the Chairman clearly intimates that even as to general appropriation bills if the necessity for the reservation of points of order, in order to be able to make points of order upon the consideration of the bill, was presented as a new or original proposition, he would have no difficulty in holding that it was unnecessary. But the practice undoubtedly is that as to general appropriation bills all points of order must be reserved in advance. If points of order are not reserved when the bill is sent to the Committee of the Whole, then points of order may not be entertained in the consideration of the bill. See Volume V, Hinds', section 6923.

It therefore clearly appears that as to general appropriation bills, points of order must be reserved before the bill is sent to the Committee of the Whole, in order that questions of order against the contents of the bill may be raised in the committee. But this requirement does not apply to other bills that are committed to the Committee of the Whole. As to these bills, and the right to raise points of order upon their consideration in the committee, the Members have the same right as the Members have as to a general appropriation bill with respect to which points of order have been reserved. Now for an application of these principles, suppose a general appropriation bill is committed to the Committee of the Whole and all points of order are reserved. Upon consideration, if offending matter is found in the bill, whether matter appropriately belonging to other committees, or illegal matter of a different character, a point of order may be directed against it.

But if no points of order have been reserved, then points of order on consideration of the bill may not be made. The reservation of the points of order does not change the character or quality of the offending matter. It merely gives a Member the right to reach it, by a point of order. Now as other bills sent to the Committee of the Whole do not require this reservation, a Member upon the consideration of such bills has precisely the same right to reach illegal matter by a point of order that a Member has to take this course upon the consideration of a general appropriation bill, when all points of order have been reserved. Sections 6921, 6889, and 6891 of volume 5 of Hinds, and sections 4365 and 4372 of volume 4, have been cited to show that upon consideration of a bill containing some matter not belonging to the jurisdiction of the committee reporting the bill, a point of order may not be made against this matter. But all of these citations refer to the totally different situation of a bill that has been improperly referred, and correction is not made as prescribed by the rules. In such case when the bill is reported, no objection can be made to the effect that the committee making the report was without original jurisdiction of the entire subject matter.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What would be the effect on the bill if this point of order had not been raised?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. What would have been the effect on the Post Office appropriation bill if the point of order had not been raised as to the portion of it relating to experimental traffic on the rural routes? The bill would have been passed with that provision in it, and the whole would have become the law. If a point of order is not raised against legislation on an appropriation bill, the legislation remains in the bill and becomes law. That answers the gentleman's question.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I ask the question as one who knows little about the parliamentary law and who in a way sits at the feet of the gentleman in respect to that subject.

I find it stated in a note to the rule which the gentleman has quoted that "an erroneous reference of a public bill under this rule if it remains uncorrected gives jurisdiction."

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I have stated that to be true. The committee is thereby given jurisdiction.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Now, coming to the case we have here of a bill relating to two subjects, one within the jurisdiction, admittedly, of this particular committee, and the other not within the jurisdiction of the committee, and there is this further statement:

A bill may not be divided among two or more committees, although it may contain matter within the jurisdiction of several committees.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Certainly not.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. It would seem, then, that it would not be competent to refer this bill to two committees.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Certainly not.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. And yet, it being possible to refer it to only one committee and that committee having considered it, nevertheless when it is reported to the House the gentleman claims that it is only competent for the House to consider the particular portion of which the committee has jurisdiction.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Precisely, the committee should report only on those matters that belong to its jurisdiction under the rules.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman permit me to call his attention to the fact that the point of order is made not to a part of the bill but to the whole bill?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I have stated that if it is made against the jurisdiction of the committee as a whole I have nothing to say, but I do not understand that to be the case.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. That is the situation.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Chairman, I am not a parliamentarian, but it would appear to a layman that the contention of the gentleman from Virginia would reduce legislation to an absurdity. It is admitted that there is no one committee that would have jurisdiction over all features of this question, and therefore because of that fact you could not consummate legislation. I respectfully submit that that is an absurdity that you should tie yourself up with rules so that you can not legislate at all.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, to make my position understood I want to say that my point of order is intended to be made primarily against this provision of the bill over which this committee has no jurisdiction. Secondly, I insist that it is necessarily directed against the entire bill, for the reason that the bill is not divisible. In other words, you can not eliminate that portion of the bill dealing with matters over which the committee has no jurisdiction without destroying the entire bill. For instance, it provides for pensions for those who served "during any war." As is conceded, this Committee on Invalid Pensions, which reported out the bill under consideration, only has jurisdiction over Civil War pensions and not over those of the last war nor the Spanish-American War. In order to eliminate the objectionable provision, it would be necessary to strike out the words "any war," if it could be done at all. That would not leave any sense at all. If it was a bill that was divisible—in other words, one in which you could elide the objectionable features—you could do so, and then go ahead and enact the balance. However, that can not be done, and so the point is good against the entire bill.

The CHAIRMAN. This bill was introduced in the House January 5 and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. The House thereby had knowledge of the contents of the bill and its reference. No objection was made to the reference and there was no attempt to have it referred to any other committee. On January 12 the bill was reported back to the House by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed. The House again had notice that the Committee on Invalid Pensions had been considering this bill, had ordered a favorable report upon it, and that the bill in its present form had been referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration. Still no objection or point of order was raised.

To-day, the calendar being called, the gentleman from Illinois rose in his place and called up the bill. It was read in its entirety in the House. The House then went into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill. In other words, the House ordered the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider this bill. It was again read in its entirety before consideration was begun in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and yet no point of order was made against the bill.

Consideration of the bill was begun, debate was had pro and con in the committee, and the bill had been read in its entirety for amendment before the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] made his point of order.

It seems to the Chair that so far as any point of order against the bill as a whole is concerned, the point of order comes too late, because it is undoubtedly the better practice of the House that after the consideration of a bill has begun in Committee of the Whole it is too late to raise the point of order as to the manner or form in which the bill was reported to the House. The following quotation from the syllabus of Hinds' Precedents is in point:

After the House has actually entered upon the consideration of a bill it is too late to make a point of order that it was not properly reported from the committee. (V, Hinds' Precedents, 6889.)

The following seems also to be nearly on all fours with the case now pending:

A public bill having been reported by a committee and being under consideration in Committee of the Whole, it was held that the question of jurisdiction might not then be considered. (IV, Hinds' Precedents, 4372.)

The gentleman from Tennessee has not made a point of order against any particular or specific language of the bill. He has stated the substance of that which he claims to be in violation of the rules of the House as to jurisdiction, but has not pointed out the particular phraseology of the bill which he deems offensive to the rule. Therefore the Chair can not pass upon that point. It seems to the Chair that under the decisions of the House, and the universal practice so far as the present occupant of the chair has been able to find, the point of order of the gentleman from Tennessee is not well taken. The Chair, therefore, overrules the point of order.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, that amendment simply limits the operation of the bill prior to April 6, 1917, so as not to conflict with the war-risk act.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on line 6, page 1, after the word "service," insert "and in the line of duty while in such service."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 6, after the word "service," insert "and in the line of duty while in such service."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a perfecting amendment to the gentleman's amendment. At the end of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois I move to amend by adding this language: "free from charges of desertion."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the amendment, offered by Mr. BLANTON: After the word "service" at the end of the proposed amendment, insert the words "free from charges of desertion."

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. If the amendment of the gentleman be adopted, then will it not be necessary for the widows to also show affirmatively that there was no desertion?

Mr. BLANTON. No; because in the first place that is a matter of record in The Adjutant General's office, evidence of which could be procured in a few hours' time on any given case, and it is required on any and every case, anyway. In the second place, it ought to be shown in every case.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit just one question to the chairman of the committee. In view of the ruling of the department and the amendment that he has suggested, I want to read, if I may, the ruling of the department that this bill, as stated by the chairman, is to remedy.

The official records show that the claimant's soldier husband died in the service, and while it is true that death in the service and line of duty constitutes an honorable discharge, it precludes any assumption whatever of death subsequent to an honorable discharge.

May I ask, if the amendment is adopted, do you not place the matter exactly in the same situation it is now, and will you not go back to identically the same question that you are confronted with in the department now? I ask this for information.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. I hardly think the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas should be adopted, and the amendment which I have proposed and to which he proposes his amendment provides, in substance, that a man should have been killed in action or died of wounds incurred or disease contracted in such service and in the line of duty while in such service. It would be a little absurd to have him charged with desertion when he was killed in action or died of wounds incurred or disease contracted while in the service and in the line of duty. It seems to me it would be absurd to presume that the charge of desertion was or could be held against that man.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, it may be a little out of place for me to say a word for the deserter of the Civil War, but I have been surprised after an examination of about 500 desertion cases in the Military Affairs Committee to find how careless we have been with regard to that class of people. We have become familiar in this recent war with what we call the shell-shocked cases. I am inclined to think that the deserter of the Civil War to a large extent was the shell-shocked soldier of this war, and he has been carried on the records of the War Department for about 50 years as a deserter. Of course, a great many of those cases we have there are not in the class I describe, but a great many of them are, and it is a sad reflection to go through some of those cases and see how utterly futile have been the efforts of some of these men to get the merits of their particular cases considered. Their cases have been here, some of them, for 10 or 15 or 20 years. A great many of them have passed the House after careful consideration, and a great many of them have passed the Senate after careful consideration, but not at the same session of Congress, so that probably one might say that 1 or 2 per cent have become laws.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. In just a moment. These cases are often like this: The soldier was in the hospital at the close of the war or at some other time during the war, and I refer to this now because it has very great application upon the amendment that the gentleman from Texas proposes. They were not so formal in their military matters in 1861–1865 as they are now. When the soldier was discharged from the hospital, being under no restraint, or sometimes before he was discharged, when he thought he had recovered, he went home, or in a great many cases at the close of the war these men were in the hospitals. Almost all of the Civil War soldiers who were in hospitals at the close of the war were subject to a charge of desertion. I have 30 to 40 cases in that committee where the wounded soldiers of the Civil War are carried on the records of The Adjutant General as deserters because they were in hospitals at the time the war closed, and now you want to put a stain on the widows because their widows after their death can not disprove that charge.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SANFORD. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. RUCKER. Let me say in connection with what the gentleman has just said, that some few years ago I introduced a bill to remove the charge of desertion. In support of that bill it so happened that the officer himself who made the charge was still living, and in his own handwriting he wrote into the affidavit himself, on file in this Capitol, that he made the charge under misinformation, made it inadvertently, and that he had placed a stain upon the man's character and his military valor which he would gladly have removed years ago if he had had the power and the soldier had appealed to Congress to do it. I take it that a great many men have been done an injustice by reason of the unfortunate action of some member of the Army who to-day, and who for many years, has passed away so that he can not be heard.

Mr. SANFORD. Of course, the number of these persons is, relatively speaking, small. But when you see the intimate character of the case, in the personal point of view of the old fellow who comes hobbling to Washington to find out about his case that has been pending for, say, 20 years, it is pathetic. Not long ago a man from Georgia came to see me, and on examination I found that his case had been reported in this House four or five times, and sometimes it had been passed by the Senate, but it never received consideration in both branches at the same session. I told him I would do what I could for him, but I knew there was little chance to help. He is 80 years old. He had not discovered the charge that was against him until about 20 years ago, and during those 20 years he has not been able to get it removed.

I want to make the point that at the time of the Civil War the study of mental diseases in the practice of medicine had not progressed to the point that it has reached at this time. During the last war, if a soldier was out of his mind he was sent to the hospital, where he had doctors and Red Cross nurses to take care of him. In the Civil War, when a man lost his mind he was faced with a criminal charge and accused of cowardice and of being a deserter. And I firmly believe, from the cases I have seen, that the shell-shock patient of this war is marked as the coward of the Civil War.

Take the case of a man whose case I examined recently and who served three years in the Civil War. The record of his officers and noncommissioned officers was that he was the bravest man in his company, but in one of the battles, toward the end of the war, he was found under his bed, and the charge of cowardice was brought against him. And his family is now trying to have the charge removed. There was no question but that he was a brave soldier. But in the stress of battle, through the noise and shock—and he had been through 15 or 20 major engagements—his mind broke down, and he was tried for cowardice. He is carried on the records of the War Department to-day as a coward. If he had fought in this late war he would have been a patient in Walter Reed Hospital, or somewhere else, and would have been given every medical and nurse attention.

I do not think we have given too much attention to those men in the recent war. I believe the medical profession is pointing the true course. But when you put a man in battle and break down his body, and his mind breaks down, he is as much in need of hospital treatment as if a leg was off or an eye out. But they did not recognize the situation in 1861 to 1865, and we ought to be lenient to these men who are now called deserters in The Adjutant General's Office. They knew nothing about the case, and when the widows try to prove that the charges are unfounded they can not find the evidence to do so. I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas should be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FULLER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SANFORD: Page 1, line 6, after the word "service," insert "or who at the time of his death was drawing a pension because of such service."

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, the only effect of that amendment would be to put the Government in this position, that when the Government, through the Pension Bureau, has examined the status of the soldier during his lifetime and has carried him through his lifetime and to his death as a pensioner and an honorably discharged soldier, they shall not raise the question after his death against his widow. It seems to me there is no answer to that position, and I think the amendment should be adopted.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. I am in favor of the amendment. The question is where it should come in. The amendment just adopted comes after the word "service."

Mr. SANFORD. It should come in after your amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the language read as already amended and as it will read if it is amended by the gentleman's amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the amendment that has already been adopted, with the amendment, if adopted, of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD].

The Clerk read as follows:

That every person who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during any war prior to April 6, 1917, who was killed in action or died of wounds incurred or disease contracted in such service and in the line of duty while in such service, shall be deemed to have been honorably discharged from such service.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to change my amendment, in view of the wording of the other amendment, to read:

Or any such person who at the time was drawing a pension because of such service.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "service," in the amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FULLER], insert: "or any such person who at the time of his death was drawing a pension because of such service."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 3, page 1, the word "every" and insert the word "any."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Page 1, line 3, after the word "that," strike out the word "every" and insert the word "any."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I understand that amendment is acceptable to the chairman of the committee, but I would like to ask him in reference to a further provision in the bill. In lines 7 and 8 it says:

And widow or former widow of such person shall be entitled to be paid a pension—

And so forth.

Now, that would permit the payment of a pension to a Civil War veteran's widow who has remarried and was still living with her second husband, would it not? She would still be the former widow of that veteran soldier, would she not?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Well, perhaps, that should be made more specific there.

Mr. WALSH. Should there not be put in there something like the limitation that is contained in the act of 1908, to the effect that she is again a widow, having remarried since his death, or having been divorced from her second husband without fault on her part, or something to that effect?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. It might be put in that shape. The pending amendment, however, has not yet been voted on.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to ask a question of the chairman of the committee [Mr. FULLER of Illinois]. In view of the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD], apparently in behalf of pensioning deserters, I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FULLER] whether it is the purpose of this bill and the idea of his committee in presenting it to give pensions to men who were deserters in fact, or to the widows of such men?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. The gentleman's amendment covers the point absolutely. The soldier must have died in line of duty or while in the service.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The bill reads, originally, that if he "died as the result of wounds or disability incurred while in the service." I understand that the amendment of the gentleman means that he must have died in the service. Is that the meaning of the amendment that has been adopted?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. It would have to be shown that he died in the service while in line of duty in order that the bill should apply.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. If that is the purpose of the bill, I am in hearty agreement with it. But if it is the purpose of this bill to pension deserters, men as to whose desertion there is no dispute, or their widows, of course I could not support the bill.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. The gentleman can form his opinion of the language as well as I could.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] argued in behalf of pensions to deserters, and following that a vote was taken which might have been interpreted as approving the gentleman's remarks, of which I do not approve. If a man were not a deserter his record could be corrected and will be corrected by act of Congress. But if he is a deserter, why——

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. SANFORD. Would the gentleman be in favor of holding a man to be a deserter whose leg was shot off at Gettysburg, if the records in the War Department show that fact, and truthfully so?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman knows that Congress has corrected every erroneous record of that kind when it has been brought to its attention. We have been correcting such records for many years, and I believe there are no remaining cases of that kind where the veteran can make the necessary proof. Their records having been corrected so as to show the facts, all such men and their widows are now pensioned, so there is no point to the gentleman's question.

Mr. SANFORD. They may not have had their legs shot off, but they may have been shown to have been seriously wounded.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Of course, there are cases where a man is set down as having deserted, and 40 years afterwards he comes forward and says that record of desertion was made while he was in a hospital sick. He may have been in a hospital. There is no way of proving that he was not. But the chances are that that was a mere excuse, an insincere excuse, and that the man ran away because he was tired of the Army.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] speaks pathetically about a man being found hiding under a bed. If a man is a real deserter, that is probably where he would be found. If a man is a real deserter, that is one situation. If, on the other hand, he is unjustly charged with being a deserter, that is another situation. If this bill purposes to give pensions to real deserters, it is an outrage. If, on the other hand, it is intended simply to give relief to widows of men who are unjustly charged with desertion, that is a different proposition.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. QUIN. The gentleman is correct as to the policy on the part of Congress of relieving men from unjust charges of desertion. While I was on a subcommittee there were 2,000 cases of men who were recorded as deserters who were endeavoring to have that record removed in order to get a pension. Only a few of them were entitled to have the charge of desertion removed so as to be entitled to a pension. Certainly this bill is wrong if it purports to pension the widows of all deserters. I agree with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] on that point.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. According to the terms of this bill, if a man had a disease while in the Army, from which he later died, and yet was convicted of desertion, would he not be entitled to a pension?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I understand the gentleman from New York to argue that his widow ought to have a pension.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I think there is no doubt that this bill is merely for the benefit of widows of soldiers who were killed in line of duty.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. But it applies to men who died from disease contracted in the line of duty, and their deaths may have been years after they had ceased to belong to the Army.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Then it would not have been in line of duty.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I fear the bill is not clear in showing that they are required to have died in line of duty. I want to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHBROOK], who is a representative of this side of the House on the committee, if it was the purpose of the committee to give to a deserter or his widow a pension—a real deserter? Is that the purpose of this bill?

Mr. ASHBROOK. I am glad to say to my friend that when this bill was considered in the committee it was intended simply to care for cases where the widow was denied a pension because her husband was killed in the service, and therefore did not have an honorable discharge.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Then why is the provision put in here providing for the case of the widow of a soldier who died as the result of disease incurred in the service.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I do not understand that the bill contains that provision. It says "incurred while in line of duty."

Mr. STEPHENS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Ohio. The gentleman spoke about desertions. I simply want to call his attention to one particular case that I am familiar with.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. We are all familiar with such cases.

Mr. STEPHENS of Ohio. I want to call attention to a case where a man served as a captain, fought at Shiloh, and went home and lived for years, and farmed, and after his death his widow discovered that his record in Washington showed that he was a deserter, and that record has never been cleared up.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. He may have been a deserter for all I know. Many soldiers have fought in battle and subsequently deserted and gone home.

Mr. STEPHENS of Ohio. Never.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to take only a minute to say this: We can not fool ourselves on this bill, because under its present terms you will find that there can be a case where a man has served in the Army and has contracted a disease or has been wounded, even in the line of his service, and afterwards deserted; and yet under the terms of this bill his widow will draw a pension.

Gentlemen, do not deceive yourselves, because this possibility does exist in this bill under its present phraseology, and you can not get away from it. Without amendment, in voting for this bill, you will vote to reward a deserter who deserts his flag in war time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK: Page 1, line 8, after the word "person," insert "who, having remarried since his death, is again a widow, or has been divorced from the last husband upon her own application without fault on her part."

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. I accept that amendment.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, this is the same amendment as that suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts. I happened to have it already prepared, and he suggested that I offer it.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. That is all right.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. VAILE: Page 2, line 4, after the word "therefrom," insert "notwithstanding the military services of such person during such war may not have been rendered or performed at the scene of hostilities or the geographical location of military operations on sea or land during such war."

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to correct what appears to me to be a very technical ruling by the Pension Bureau, which excludes the families of members of the Regular Establishment who served in the War with Spain from drawing pensions if they were not at the actual scene of hostilities for 90 days during the war, whereas members of the Volunteer Establishment are on a different footing and their widows can get such pensions. The gentleman from Ohio, Judge GARD, cited a case which was very extreme but which certainly illustrates the point. His case was that of a soldier who had served one full enlistment period and reenlisted for his second enlistment period a few days before the battle of San Juan Hill. He was wounded in that battle, taken to a hospital away from the scene of hostilities, and was afterwards discharged on a medical certificate as a result of the wound which he received. Afterwards he died, and because he had not been 90 days at the scene of actual hostilities the widow is debarred from receiving a pension. I have in my hand the opinion of the department in the case of Anna, as widow of Oscar J. R. de Rochment, decided January 31, 1919, explaining the department's ruling. It says, referring to the act of July 16, 1918:

But as the act, after providing pension for dependent widows of volunteer officers and enlisted men who served 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps "during" the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection and were honorably discharged from said service, provides pension for dependent widows of officers and enlisted men of the Regular Establishment who rendered 90 days or more "actual military or naval service in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps in the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection" and were honorably discharged therefrom it is manifest without further argument or elucidation that by the words "volunteer officer or enlisted man" in the connection in which they are used in the act was meant any person who was commissioned or enlisted in any organization not a part of the Regular Establishment, and such as is usually known and denominated as a volunteer organization.

Had the claimant's deceased husband been, as contended in the appeal, a volunteer man in the Army; had he served in such capacity 90 days or more "during" the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection and been honorably discharged from said service she would as his widow have title to pension under the act if dependent within the meaning thereof. But as he served as an enlisted man in the Regular Establishment in order for her to have such title he must have rendered 90 days or more "actual military or naval service" in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps "in" the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection or as a participant in the Chinese Boxer rebellion campaign and been honorably discharged therefrom. "In" the War with Spain, according to this decision, means only at the fighting front.

And the department held that, while a volunteer soldier's widow can receive a pension, the widow of a Regular Army soldier can not. It seems to me that is an unfair distinction against the widow of the Regular soldier. A great many men in the Spanish War enlisted voluntarily in the Regular Army, because they expected that in that way they would more quickly get actual service at the front. If these men had been married and had been killed in action, their widows could not now receive pensions from the Government, notwithstanding their service was undertaken in that way for the very purpose of enabling them to get to the front, unless they had actually got to the front and had served 90 days or been killed in action. I think the amendment is in entire accord with the spirit of the bill and that it should be adopted. But unless the bill allows pensionable status to the widow of a soldier who died after his discharge she can not receive a pension if her husband was a Regular who was not 90 days at the front, even though he died from a wound received in battle while he was there.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. PELL: Page 1, line 7, after the word "service," insert "unless he be a deserter or under charges at the end of his service."

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. This is the same amendment that had been voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman indicate to the Chair what amendment embodying this language has been voted on? Does the gentleman refer to the Blanton amendment?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. An examination of the two amendments indicates that they are not identically the same. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PELL] is recognized in support of his amendment.

Mr. PELL. Mr. Chairman, the object of this bill quite obviously is to allow to men who have been killed and of whom no record is found all the credit which would be given to them had they been honorably discharged; that is to say, it is to remove a technical disability in the case of a man missing, or a man killed who could not be identified; but I do not think it is our intention to allow that privilege to extend to the men who have willfully deserted. Although there may be occasions when a man who had so deserted might possibly be justified in receiving a pension, I certainly do not think such people should be taken care of by a general law. Such instances can not be frequent. There can not be many men who having deserted deserve pensions. It can be only the very special circumstances of a particular case that can justify us in pensioning such a man. Prima facie a deserter should not be granted any support whatsoever from the Government, and the amendment which I have offered will protect men who could not be identified, who died in prison, or of whom for one reason or another we have not a complete record. It will give them the benefit of the doubt. But I do not want to see a bill go through which will pension the men who are proven to be deserters. If we want to do anything for such men, let us be bold enough to come out openly and say "We give a pension to so and so, a deserter"; but do not let us pass a general bill which will cover deserters. It would be an insult to every man who has honorably worn the uniform of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, can we have the amendment reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 6, after the word "service," insert the words "unless he be a deserter or under charges at the end of his service."

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, in my opinion this bill seeks to remove a defect in the pension laws of the United States. It is a defect that ought to have been remedied long years ago. I think its passage, if properly amended, will prove gratifying to every old soldier that served in that terrible ordeal between 1861 and 1865.

But in my opinion, Mr. Chairman, if it passes with the language that is now in it every man who was brave enough to shoulder a musket and follow the flag during the Civil War will in his heart condemn this Congress for its action. This bill, unless the gentleman's amendment is adopted, would put a man who deserted, if perchance he had been injured before desertion, in the same category, in the same status, as the man who boldly pressed forward in front of the enemy.

I know what I am talking about. I know every soldier in this land will condemn it.

Mr. SANFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. Yes.

Mr. SANFORD. Does not the gentleman think that we are in a strong position when 50 years after the war we accept the wounds themselves as a proof of courage and fail to raise against the widow after the death of the soldier a question that would exclude her?

Mr. RUCKER. Pass this bill and hereafter the only thing on earth the soldier would ever dread would be the court-martial.

Mr. SANFORD. Does not the gentleman think that the wounds are conclusive of courage?

Mr. RUCKER. Not always; a man might get his leg broken running from the enemy. I think wounds received are very persuasive evidence of courage, but it is not conclusive. I agree with the remarks made a little while ago by the gentleman from New York with reference to the jurisdiction and the duty of the great Committee on Military Affairs to correct these records which have done many soldiers injustice. That committee ought to get busy with these bills. I have one before them which ought to be passed, and there are a thousand which ought to be passed.

But let us first remove the blot of desertion before we line them up side by side with the brave and distinguished men, heroes of the war. [Applause.] Now, I am as good a friend of the soldier as any man on either side of this House, but as this bill now stands I would not vote for it. I would vote against it in the hope that my vote against it would defeat it, and yet I am heartily in favor of its passage.

Mr. PARRISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. Yes.

Mr. PARRISH. In reply to what the gentleman said that the wounds are not conclusive of courage, is it not a fact that Benedict Arnold was wounded in the line of service and afterwards became a traitor?

Mr. RUCKER. Oh, yes; everybody knows that.

Mr. PELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. Yes.

Mr. PELL. My amendment only applies in case where a man is a pronounced deserter.

Mr. SANFORD. With the gentleman's permission, let me say that you can not try the question of desertion at this time in the majority of cases. What defeats a man now if his name appears on the roll of The Adjutant General as not having reported and not having got a discharge, he is a deserter, and his widow can not make the desired proof to remove it. I think if the bill passes it will save more money in clerk hire at the Pension Bureau than it will cost to pay the extra pension.

Mr. RUCKER. The best way to save the clerks in the Pension Office work which the gentleman refers to is for the Committee on Military Affairs to get busy and do its duty. I am not complaining of the committee, but it should do its duty and investigate each individual case, find where the injustice has been done to the soldier, and have the courage of their convictions to correct it. Those records ought to be wiped out. If there is merit in the charge, if it be a true charge, then let the man share the fate or his wife share that which he himself invited by his conduct.

But, Mr. Chairman, in behalf of the brave and gallant old soldiers in my district, I appeal to the chairman of this committee to vote for the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PELL], and let it be so that everybody in the House on both sides may join in passing this very meritorious bill, which ought to have been passed many years ago. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from New York will be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Benedict Arnold was wounded prior to his act of treason. His leg was broken if my memory is not at fault in the gallant assault upon Quebec. Yet if a bill of this character had been enacted after the Revolutionary War, his widow would have drawn a pension under its provisions. I think it has been admitted on behalf of the committee, that this bill is not designed to afford a pension to the widows of deserters.

I freely concede there have been some cases where injustice has been done, but it would be far better to leave such cases for individual inquiry, so that appropriate justice may be accorded, as has been done in many cases, rather than undertake by a sweeping general bill to provide without qualification that the widows of deserters shall receive pensions. It seems to be agreed on both sides of the Chamber that if this bill passes in its present form, it will have that precise effect. Does this body desire to go on record as being in favor of a bill embodying so offensive a proposition? If not, then they should agree to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PELL], which establishes a very different general policy.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks it would be sound public policy with reference to the future to hold out to the young men of America that we are going to pension soldiers regardless of whether they are deserters or not?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. There is nothing that would be more offensive to the old soldiers, the veterans of the Civil War, or the veterans of the war from which we have just emerged victorious, than the suggestion that awards should be paid for desertions from the service, that men who failed at the Argonne, or at the crossing of the Meuse, or in any of those famous battles, in France, and became deserters, should be placed on the same footing as to pensions, as the loyal soldiers. I imagine that such a plan would be indignantly repudiated both by the veterans of the present and of the Civil War. Unless we propose to do that very thing, to change our policy, to retrace our steps with respect to deserters, and our attitude toward them, we ought to make it clear by appropriate amendment that this bill is not intended to give rewards to deserters or anyone claiming through them. If the House does not propose to do that sort of thing then I think the amendment of the gentleman from New York will commend itself to our favorable consideration. Nor will this amendment work any hardship in individual cases where it is contended that the record should be corrected. Appropriate procedure is provided for such cases. In any proper case supported by the evidence, relief will be readily granted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 35, noes 39.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. PELL and Mr. VAILE to act as tellers.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported ayes 39, noes 52.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 8, at the end of the Black amendment, insert "or any minor, dependent child or children under the age of 16."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the amendment is designed to include that which is included in every other pension law, to wit, any dependent minor child or children under the age of 16 years of the person originally entitled to a pension. So far as I am advised, every existing pension law carries proper provision for minor dependent child or children under the age of 16 years. As the bill now stands, it would probably have its most important application, in so far as this amendment is concerned, to the children of the Spanish-American War soldiers, although when I submitted it to the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FULLER], he said that there were cases to his knowledge which would come within the purview of the veterans of the War between the States, but the greater number of cases, of course, would apply to soldiers of the Spanish-American War. There is no provision in the bill which provides for a dependent minor child or children of Spanish War soldiers who were killed, but who heretofore have not been entitled to a pension, but who under this law would be entitled to a pension. I am speaking rather to the merits of the amendment than the point of order, since I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts reserves the point of order.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes. I will say to the gentleman that the matter is one which I took to the chairman of the committee, and he was of opinion that some such language should be included.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman understand that dependent minors of Spanish War veterans are not now provided for in existing law?

Mr. GARD. Oh, as a general proposition I understand they are, but under the particular circumstances of this bill, unless some such language is included, they are not.

Mr. VAILE. I would suggest to the gentleman that they would not be provided for by existing law if they were children of Regulars who had not served 90 days at the actual scene of operations.

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman's amendment is agreed to, it would make provision for minors, dependent children of Spanish War veterans who did not serve 90 days.

Mr. VAILE. At the actual scene of operations.

Mr. WALSH. He may have been wounded in the service or have died before that time.

Mr. GARD. Who may have been wounded in the service, and who was sent from the actual scene of conflict, and was not present in the active participation the required number of days. I will say that the distinction is what seems to me to be an improper one in the rulings of the Pension Commissioner as between soldiers of the Regular Army and those who are not.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 2, by striking out the words "for 90 days or more."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Delaware offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 2, strike out the words "for 90 days or more."

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment, of course, is very evident to the House. Recently a pension bill was introduced, but was introduced in such a fashion that I was unable to get an opportunity to express my views on a matter connected with pensions relating to the Civil War, which I think has been a burning shame to the whole country.

I am referring to those men who were honorably enlisted, who were called upon in the darkest hour of the Republic, when the great commander from Virginia with his host were treading upon Pennsylvania soil, and when every Union arm was demanded. The 60-day men were enlisted and were put into service. They guarded the fords and the bridges; they went away from their homes without any adequate training—from the soft places of home—out into the open life upon the ground, and many of them incurred serious diseases, many of them lost their lives. But under the policy of this House no man who served for 60 days can receive any benefit at all from the Federal Government. An arbitrary line was established at 90 days. Now, I am aware that possibly my amendment may be subject to a point of order, because there is an existing law now that restricts the benefit of the Government to those who served for less than 90 days. I have, however, taken this occasion to express myself on this question.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. BLACK. If I understand the true meaning of this bill, it is to do that very thing that the gentleman is talking of. It does not say that a man who was wounded in the service must have been in the service 90 days, or if he contracted disease that subsequently resulted in his death he must have been in the service 90 days, but it only says in such cases as that the widow shall receive the same rate of pension as given under the Ashbrook law, which did require 90 days of service. I think the gentleman's amendment would not have any effect, except probably to complicate the situation.

Mr. LAYTON. My desire was to voice my opinion in regard to the general policy of the Government in regard to those 60-day men. I want to call the attention of the House to this fact, that in the recent war we made no such discrimination. We absolutely gave the soldier who was honorably enlisted the benefit of all the paternal care of the Government even if he was in the service but for one day. But the whole policy of the country has been to exclude those men who served 60 days in the Civil War.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. If the gentleman will yield, I think the amendment proposed here would not have the effect that he desires. It does not grant pensions to anybody whether they served 60 days or 90 days. It simply provides pensions for widows the same as for soldiers who served 60 or 90 days.

Mr. LAYTON. Could the widow of a man who served 60 days get the benefit of this bill?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Yes. It does not make any difference about that at all.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. LAYTON. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think the gentleman, inadvertently, I have no doubt, misstated the law in reference to the Civil War pensions. We never had a law which refused to give a pension to the wife of a man who was killed in battle or the wife of a man who was wounded in battle, no matter how few days he served.

Mr. LAYTON. The gentleman knows this, as every man knows it who is as old as I am, and who has practiced as a physician and has drawn up certificates ad infinitum, that the beneficent provisions of the general pension acts have not been extended to men unless they served 90 days.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is thinking of the length of service of the men. That related to the service pension. If they had not served 90 days they could not get a pension.

Mr. LAYTON. Has the Federal Government given a man who served for 60 days the same paternal care in respect to pensions as those who served 90 days and over?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, I happen to be a member of the committee which considered this bill. I thought at the time the committee considered it that I understood it, and I still hope that I do. My understanding of the bill is this, and this explanation was made to the committee—I trust I am not stating anything to the House that is not proper for me to state as a member of that committee—it was stated to the committee by the chairman of the committee that a soldier who was killed in service was held by the Pension Office to have not received an honorable discharge, and on the pension rolls he is classed as a deserter, and his widow therefore is unable to secure a pension; that this bill was merely for the purpose of giving the widows of those soldiers who were killed in the service a pensionable status. I would like to inquire of my good friend, the chairman of the committee, whether or not my understanding of the bill is correct?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. It was not confined to those killed in the service, but extended to those who died of wounds or disease contracted in the service. It arose from the decision of the Pension Bureau, which is attached to the report in this case, in regard to a case that came before them under the Ashbrook law, where it was held that because the soldier husband of the widow died in the service that he was therefore not honorably discharged.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Died in the service?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Died in the service; and therefore was not honorably discharged, and therefore could not draw a pension under the act of December 8, 1916.

Mr. ASHBROOK. That is correct. I would like to ask the chairman further. In line 5 it reads:

> Or died of wounds incurred or disease contracted in such service.

Do I understand by that that if the soldier was wounded while in the service or contracted disease while in the service, and 10, 20, or 40 years afterwards he should die of that disease, or of such wounds, and the soldier did not have an honorable discharge, then his widow was entitled to a pension?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. I presume the gentleman has not been present in the committee or he would remember an amendment that I offered. After the word "service," line 6, the following words were inserted:

> Or in the line of duty while in such service.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Well, then, just one question more. Then it is the understanding of the chairman of this committee that this bill will not give a pension to any widow of a soldier unless he was killed in the service or in the line of service?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. That is my understanding.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Just one word more. I think, gentlemen, if that is all this bill does—and that is all that I understood it would do—there ought not to be any opposition whatever to the bill. But if the bill gives a pension to a deserter I am not in favor of it. I am not in favor of giving a pension to a deserter or to a widow of a deserter.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASHBROOK. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. Does not the bill on its face say "or died of disease when contracted in the service"—two years afterwards; in the meantime he became a deserter. That is what it means, and the gentleman from Illinois says so.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASHBROOK. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman has in mind the fact that an amendment was offered to make it absolutely clear that it was not intended to give pensions to the widows of deserters. That amendment was voted down. Therefore it might be inferred that the men who voted for the amendment thought differently from the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHBROOK].

Mr. ASHBROOK. I think this ought to be made clear. There is no man in this House who is more in favor of generous pensions and generous pension legislation than I am. I voted for the amendment of the gentleman from New York because I thought that cleared it up. It ought to be cleared up. If the gentleman from Illinois is not certain of the matter and if the bill as it now reads will give a pension to the widow of the deserter, then I am not in favor of the Pell amendment.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LAYTON. I would like to know if the amendment that I offered was ruled out on a point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. No. No point of order was made, or if one was made it was withdrawn. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEE] has offered a pro forma amendment.

Mr. LAYTON. What has become of the amendment that I offered?

The CHAIRMAN. It is now being discussed.

Mr. LAYTON. I did not know that it was being discussed.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FULLER] about this language, "died of wounds or disease contracted in the service." Suppose this condition arises: A man deserts the service and incurs a disease from which he dies before he has been punished as a deserter. He is still borne on the rolls as a soldier, and before the judgment of desertion and a record of dishonorable discharge is registered against him he dies. Would he not be put, or would his widow not be put, on a pensionable status under the words there?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. In the amendment I offered on page 1, line 6, there were inserted the words "in line of duty while in such service." I am afraid it is not as explicit as it should be, or it is not just what I intended it to be. I want to correct that amendment by adding, after the word "duty," the words "and while in such service." That is to provide that he should have died in the service. I intended that when the amendment was offered—that it should have the word "and" inserted after the word "duty" in that amendment.

Mr. BEE. Suppose a man deserts the Army to-day and dies to-morrow. He has not yet been tried and convicted and dishonorably discharged. Would not his widow have a pensionable status even under the gentleman's amended amendment?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Not if he deserted.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman permit me further?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. I think the amended amendment would cover the case.

Mr. BEE. A man who leaves the service is given 10 days' leave. If he has not returned within the 10 days he is carried as "absent without leave." After the 10 days the charge of desertion is entered against him. The point I want to emphasize to the gentleman from Illinois is that a man may leave to-day and die to-morrow, with the full intention of deserting, but he has not been carried on the roll either as a deserter or as having been convicted of desertion by a court-martial and given a dishonorable discharge. The effect is that the widow of that man would have a pensionable status even under the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois. Is not that correct?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. I do not see how a bill can be drawn that would anticipate every possible case that might arise in a million cases. I think if the word "and" is added before the words "while in the service" the whole subject will be covered.

Mr. BEE. Does the gentleman leave to the Pension Department the discretion to pass upon a case like that which I have just illustrated?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I do this particularly because the gavel fell before I had completed my answer to the question propounded by the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON]. My answer might be misunderstood as it stands.

The question was whether the Government gave the same care to those who had served less than 90 days in the Army in the Civil War as it has given to those who had served more. Then the gavel fell. What I intended to say was this: That it gave the same care in case of death, disease, or wounded while in the service. For service, of course, no pension is given for less than 90 days' service.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON].

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, let the amendment be read as it will appear.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LAYTON: Page 2, lines 2 and 3, strike out the words "for 90 days or more."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee just one question. How can a man be a deserter who died in the line of duty or was killed in the line of duty?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. I can not understand that myself. I have been trying to find out. [Laughter.]

Mr. ASHBROOK. It is so held by the Pension Department.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There is no sense in such a ruling as that.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask now to amend the section that I offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Delaware.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I want to add the word "and" to make it explicit, so that the soldier must have died while in the service.

Mr. RUCKER. I should like to have that amendment read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the language as it will read if the word "and" is inserted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 6, after the word "service," by inserting "and in the line of duty and while in such service."

Mr. BEGG. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a couple of questions. Do I understand that the purpose of this bill is to care for the widows and orphans of dead soldiers who served less than 90 days?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. It makes no difference how long they served, if they were killed or died in the service.

Mr. BEGG. All right. I will ask the gentleman if these widows and orphans of soldiers who died in the service deserve any more consideration at the hands of this Government than do the widows and orphans of those soldiers who contracted diseases in the service from which they afterwards died?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. They would be presumed to have been honorably discharged when they left the service. This bill is only to give an honorable discharge to those who died in the service.

Mr. HAWLEY. To overcome an adverse decision of the department.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Does the gentleman think there would be any objection to inserting the words "while in such service" after the word "died" in line 5? That would make it clear, so that there could not be any doubt about it, that they died while in such service of wounds incurred or disease contracted in such service.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Is there objection to the inserting of the word "and"?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Reserving the right to object, I do not believe that will accomplish the purpose the gentleman desires, because it will not be clear that the words "while in such service" refer to death. The words may refer to wounds or to disease. If it is amended as I suggest, then it will read:

Or died while in such service of wounds incurred or disease contracted in such service.

Would the gentleman be willing to accept that amendment?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. I do not think I can accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman modify his request for unanimous consent?

Mr. WALSH. If the Chair will permit, reserving the right to object, you can not upset the action of the committee in this way. We have adopted an amendment and put it in the bill. The gentleman asks for a modification of the amendment by inserting words by unanimous consent. It seems to me to be a little irregular to try to do that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to insert the word "and" at the place indicated, as read by the Clerk. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I move to insert, in line 5, page 1, after the word "died," the words "while in such service."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES of Texas: Page 1, line 5, after the word "died," insert "while in such service."

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. That simply states the matter twice.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I will move to strike out the words "while in such service" at the other place where it was offered and make my amendment include both.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES of Texas: Page 1, line 5, after the word "died," insert "while in such service"; and strike out of the amendment offered by Mr. FULLER of Illinois the words "while in such service."

Mr. WALSH. I make a point of order against that amendment. The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FULLER] has been inserted in the bill. It can not now be stricken out by hitching it up with an insertion in another place in the bill.

Mr. JONES of Texas. You can have an amendment which inserts something and strikes out something, provided it does not cover the exact terms of the former amendment. I do not move to strike out all of the Fuller amendment. I simply desire to transpose the words "while in such service."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman had his opportunity to offer this amendment when the original amendment was pending before the committee. That was the proper time for him to move to amend. It is too late to do so now, after the committee has agreed to the language of the amendment. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. VAILE. What is the matter now pending, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. JONES of Texas. A point of order, Mr. Chairman. Would it be in order to ask unanimous consent to transpose the language and insert it?

The CHAIRMAN. It would be in order to propose a request for unanimous consent and that is the only way in which it can be done at this time.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the language be so transposed as to insert the term "while in such service" in the Fuller amendment after the word "died," page 1, line 5.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the language as it would read with the transposition.

The Clerk read as follows:

That every person who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during any war, prior to April 6, 1917, who was killed in action or died while in such service of wounds incurred or disease contracted in such service and in the line of duty, etc.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 5, after the word "died," insert the words "while in such service."

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, it is claimed by the chairman of the committee that he intends by his amendment to limit the application of this bill to those who died while in the service and thus not to permit a deserter who did not see service again after the desertion to obtain the benefits of its provisions.

If the gentlemen who are fathering this bill mean what they say, they should be willing to have it made clear that the soldier or the widow of a soldier, in order to be entitled to the full pension which the bill provides, must be the soldier who was wounded or who died of disease and must have died while in the service, the others having been taken care of by the compensations and other pension laws; I submit that if you place the terms "while in such service," as it is placed in the Fuller amendment, it will refer to the terms wounds or disease and will be so construed by any reasonable person. In its present form that portion reads as follows, "died of wounds incurred or disease contracted in such service in the line of duty while in such service." It will naturally and logically apply to the terms "wounds or disease."

Under the Fuller amendment "while in such service" will be limited in its application to those two words, and every soldier, whether he is a deserter or not, who was sick, no matter how far behind the lines, who was sick in the service, and proof can be offered that he later died of that sickness or of the wounds incurred, though he may be as guilty of treason as Benedict Arnold, could get a pension from the United States Government, and his widow could also draw a pension. In fact, under its provisions the widow of Benedict Arnold could draw a pension if it had been in effect following the Revolution. There is not a man in this House who would vote to grant Benedict Arnold a pension, and I take it there is not a man in the House who would plead the right of the conscientious objector, who had been afflicted with some sort of a disease in the Army, who had stayed in the Army a few weeks and deserted and was convicted of desertion, or who would assert that the people of the Nation should be taxed to pay him a monthly pension as long as he lived or his widow after his death. And yet under the terms of this bill he will, unless you adopt my amendment, be entitled to that pension. If you are willing that it shall be so limited as to exclude deserters, vote for the language which makes it clear and satisfactory. It looks to me that the gentlemen, while saying they are willing that it shall be so limited, want to open the floodgates wide to every deserter, regardless of the circumstances of his case.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. The precise language that the gentleman wants has been incorporated in the bill.

Mr. JONES of Texas. But it does not apply to the word "death"; it only applies to wounds and diseases.

I am both willing and anxious to see every soldier who while in the service was wounded or disabled, or who contracted a disease that disabled him, or from which he died, have every care taken of him; and am also anxious that the widow of such soldier may have the Government assume a liberal attitude toward her. And, as a matter of fact, the Congress and the country will see to it that this is done. But surely neither Congress nor the country wants a man who deserted, and who remained a deserter, to be pensioned by the Government for all time; at least we should not enact a sweeping law that would include every deserter and conscientious objector in its all-inclusive provisions.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. JONES of Texas) there were 23 ayes and 43 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 5, after the word "contained," strike out the period, insert a comma, and the following: "Provided, That this act shall not apply to any soldier who died of disease so contracted and who was convicted of desertion, and who was not in such service subsequent to such desertion, nor shall it apply to the widow or former widow of such soldier."

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment has been acted upon, and although it is put in a little different language, it is not a proper method of attempting to reconsider the action of the committee.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is different language from the other two amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is not in the same language, and the point of order is overruled.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, whatever may be the merits of the contention that if a man is wounded in the service, notwithstanding that he may have been a deserter, that nevertheless he should be pensioned, as also his widow—and I concede that there may be instances where a man was severely wounded and deserted at a time when it did not amount to so much and did not reenter the service, that might be exceptional, and which, of course, could be taken care of by special legislation—I do not believe that any man can say that if a man simply has some disease while in the service, though he may be hundreds of miles from the front, though he may never have been near the front, although proof is offered that he died later of the disease, and at the same time proof is offered that he was also convicted as a deserter, his widow should be, nevertheless, in all instances, pensioned. Such a doctrine seems monstrous to me. Now, all that the amendment that I offer stipulates is this: That if a man in the service contracted a disease, from which he afterwards died, but if while he was in the service he deserted and was convicted of desertion, and never again was in the service, his widow can not receive a pension under this law. Does this Congress want to say that a man who entered the service and stayed for three weeks, who perhaps did not want to enter the service in the first place, who contracted some disease, and after he had gotten practically well, or well, deserted, and was convicted of desertion and never again entered the service, should nevertheless be paid a pension later by the Government of the United States, or that the people shall be taxed to pay his widow a pension?

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is it not a fact that a soldier is carried on the rolls for a certain number of days before he is guilty of desertion, even though he may have in fact deserted? He is absent without leave for a certain number of days before he is marked as a deserter. Would it not be possible under the terms of this bill for a deserter while running away to stumble and break his leg and then be eligible to a pension because he received a wound while in the service?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad that the gentleman has suggested that illustration. He could draw a pension, if he was injured under those circumstances, or it may be that he would run so fast while he was deserting that he would catch pneumonia from the breezes that he made, and yet under the terms of this bill he would be eligible to a pension from the United States for injuries resulting from a disease so contracted. This amendment merely limits the bill in one small particular, and that is to the effect that a man who became afflicted with some disease while in the service and who later was convicted of desertion, who was never reinstated, who never again served, shall not receive a pension, nor shall the widow of that man be entitled to receive a pension. Surely that limitation should be placed in the bill. At least a bill should not be passed that would include all such cases regardless of the merits of the individual case.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. JONES of Texas) there were—ayes 19, noes 48.

So the amedment was rejected.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to. Accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 11449 and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments?

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

Mr. PELL and Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Virginia rise?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I am.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. PELL. For the same purpose.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from New York opposed to the bill?

Mr. PELL. I am.

The SPEAKER. Is either gentleman a member of the committee?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. No.

The SPEAKER. Inasmuch as the gentleman from Virginia is the senior, the Chair will recognize him.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Invalid Pensions with instructions to that committee to report the same back forthwith with the following amendment: At the end of the bill insert: "Provided further, That no pension shall be granted under this act to any widow or former widow of a soldier, sailor, or marine who deserted the service."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to recommit.

The question was taken.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair thinks no quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 93, nays 219, not voting 116, as follows:

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays are demanded. Those in favor of taking the vote by yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Twenty-one Members have risen—not a sufficient number.

Mr. RUBEY. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the point of no quorum can not be made, the roll call had so recently having demonstrated that there is a quorum. The bill is passed.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I asked for a division in time. I asked for a division before the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McCLINTIC] called for the yeas and nays. I think we are entitled to have a division.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks a quorum is present.

Mr. RUBEY. This vote shows that there is not.

The SPEAKER. There were 180 ayes and 27 noes. That does not in itself show that there are less than 218 present.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the division vote just taken disclosed that there were less than 217 Members present, will the Speaker kindly count?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will. [After counting.] Two hundred and seventeen Members—a quorum—are present.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. FULLER of Illinois, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 22, 1920.

Rev. John Paul Tyler, of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Lord of all the earth, God of our fathers, accept, we beseech Thee, our grateful thanksgiving for all Thy mercies unto us. Forgive us wherein we have failed to see Thee and to do Thy will, and grant unto us grace that with pure and unselfish devotion to the establishment of Thy righteousness in the earth we may give ourselves to the affairs before us this day.

Let Thy blessing rest upon the President of our United States and all others in authority over us. Bless the people of our land, our homes, our loved ones. Keep us ever true to Thee, and then at last crown us with Thine own blessed, "Well done." We ask in His name, who taught us all when we pray to say:

Our Father who art in heaven. Hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread, and forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us. Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil. For Thine is the kingdom, the power, and the glory, forever. Amen.

On request of Mr. CURTIS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

Mr. ASHURST. I present resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Yavapai County, Ariz., which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"Whereas there has grown up in this country one or more organizations which openly avow their purpose and design to forcibly overthrow our Government, which openly spread revolutionary propaganda, which advise and encourage disobedience and open defiance of lawfully constituted authority, which in time of war have given aid and comfort to our enemies, and, claiming the protection of our laws, do themselves advocate and practice murder, intimidation, and wanton destruction of property as a means of furthering their unlawful and disloyal ends; and

"Whereas there are harbored in this country many of foreign birth, some of whom have been admitted to citizenship, whose chief occupation is to teach the doctrines of anarchy, syndicalism, and force, and who promote unrest and disloyalty among our population of foreign birth; and

"Whereas, as a result of the nefarious, seditious, and disloyal teachings aforesaid, there is a well-founded belief that there does now exist in this Nation an extensive organized conspiracy to forcibly overthrow our form of government, to hold our Constitution and laws in contempt, and to substitute therefor a government by a class for that class—the so-called soviet or proletariat; and

"Whereas those of our institutions which guarantee the equal rights and opportunities of all of our citizens are thus put in jeopardy: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the Chamber of Commerce of the County of Yavapai, State of Arizona, That the Senate and Congress of the United States and the legislatures of the several States be urged to enact the most stringent laws to suppress the disloyal and seditious activities above set forth; that ample funds be placed at the disposal of those charged with the enforcement of such laws; and that all aliens engaged in disloyal propaganda or practices be deported from our country: Be it further

"Resolved, That we heartily commend and urge upon the Senators and Representative from the State of Arizona their most hearty and vigorous support of H. R. 10650, entitled 'A bill defining sedition, the promoting thereof, providing punishment therefor, and for other purposes:' Be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Senators and Representative of the State of Arizona in the United States Congress.

"YAVAPAI COUNTY CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

"Approved:

"E. S. CLARK, President.

"Attest:

"[SEAL.] "B. M. SPARKES, Secretary."

Mr. ASHURST. I also ask to have printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted by Henry Berry Post, No. 4, American Legion.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

At a regular meeting of Henry Berry Post, No. 4, of the American Legion, held on the 13th day of January, 1920, the following resolution was duly adopted:

Preamble and resolution.

"Whereas a copy of the report of Attorney General Palmer to the Senate has come to the attention of this post; and

"Whereas we view with alarm the need of a proper law to deal with anarchists and radicals of all kinds who seek to destroy our Government; and

"Whereas the right of naturalization has been shamefully abused in this country and thousands of men have acquired American citizenship by fraud and bad faith; and

PROPOSED INDUSTRIAL CONFERENCE.

Mr. KENYON. I submit a concurrent resolution and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 24) was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, as follows:

Whereas in the period through which we are now passing of adjustment of war-time conditions of business and industry to normal conditions there exists no general national agency for the settlement of industrial disputes or for the determination of a general labor policy; and

Whereas no general arrangement has as yet been worked out by representatives of employers and employees as to the fundamental principles which should obtain in the adjustment of industrial relations and conditions, or the labor standards which should be observed; and

Whereas the general public has suffered much from this state of affairs, and will suffer further loss and inconvenience if the present situation is allowed to continue; and

Whereas unless some national machinery, based on certain well-defined principles for the peaceable adjustment of industrial disputes, is established, not only the continuity of production can not be maintained but also the acceleration of production to its maximum proportions, of which our country and the world are in so grievous need, can not be hoped for: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That with the desire to assist the President in the present emergency, and to bring industrial peace and prosperity to all our people, the Congress of the United States recommends the following course of action to the President:

First. That he immediately constitute a labor adjustment board, similar in its composition to the former National War Labor Board, to be designated as the national labor board, to pass upon industrial disputes pending the action of a national industrial congress as hereinafter recommended.

Second. That the national labor board shall immediately proceed to function under the principles and precedents established by the former National War Labor Board. It shall receive for adjudication either ex parte complaints or joint submissions from employers and employees, or it may institute proceedings in any controversy on its own motion or at the direction of the President or of the Congress. It shall establish in the leading industries by conference and agreement joint boards for the adjustment of labor disputes and for such other purposes as it may deem proper for the advancement of industrial peace and the public welfare.

Third. For the purpose of establishing permanent agencies for the adjustment of industrial disputes to supersede the national labor board, and for the further purpose of determining a permanent series of principles, or a code to govern future industrial relations and the adjustment of industrial disputes, and for the still further purpose of sanctioning standards of working conditions to obtain in industry, that a national industrial congress be called by the President, which shall be democratic and representative, composed of an equal number of voting delegates, of 150 each, from employers and employees, divided as follows:

I. Group of employees:

a. Ten delegates to be designated by the president of the American Federation of Labor.

b. One delegate each to be named by the chief executives of the national and international unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor.

c. One delegate to be designated by the chief executives of each of the four railway transportation brotherhoods.

d. One representative to be designated by the chief executives of each of the legitimate local unions not affiliated with the American Federation of Labor recognized by employers.

e. The remaining number of delegates to make up the total of 150 from the labor group to be selected from State and municipal federations of labor and from representatives of the National Women's Trade Union League, apportioned as may seem just and proper by the President's industrial conference as hereinafter provided, including 10 to be selected from labor not affiliated with federations of labor.

II. Group of employers—

a. Ten delegates to be designated by the National Industrial Conference Board.

b. One delegate to be selected by the president of each of the manufacturers' associations which are organized on a national basis, such as the National Erectors' Association, American Cotton Mill Manufacturers' Association, Iron and Steel Institute, National Coal Operators' Association, etc.

c. One delegate each from the representative investment banking houses which have to do particularly with the financing of industrial and transportation corporations, such delegates not to exceed a total of 25.

d. Five representatives designated by the Investment Bankers' Association.

e. Thirteen representatives designated by the United States Chamber of Commerce.

f. Twelve delegates to be designated by the Committee of Railway Executives.

g. The remaining delegates to make the total of 150 for the employers' group to be selected from other organizations of employers as the President's industrial conference may deem just and proper, as hereinafter provided, including 10 to be selected from industries not affiliated with any national association.

III. That the industrial conference, constituted entirely of representatives of the public, which has been called by the President and which is now in session, be instructed to act as a committee on organization and program for the national industrial congress hereinbefore provided, and when the industrial congress convenes the present industrial conference, together with representatives of farmers' organizations and representatives of other groups designated by it, not to exceed a total of 50, shall take part in its deliberations as representing the public.

IV. That at the conclusion of the national industrial congress the President transmit to the Congress the recommendations of the industrial congress as to legislation or other permanent action which it may have deemed advisable; and

Resolved further, That the sum of $50,000 from the funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated is hereby appropriated, to be used under the direction of the President in carrying out the foregoing recommendations.

Mr. KENYON subsequently said: Mr. President, this morning I submitted a concurrent resolution, but had no opportunity to explain it. I now embrace this opportunity to say just a word concerning its provisions.

The resolution is in reference to the labor situation. I intended to submit it some time ago, but waited for the recommendations of the present industrial conference. It is not intended at all as critical of the work or recommendation of this conference. I believe, as suggested by them, that some form of industrial courts is necessary. In the introduction of their report they say:

The right relationship between employer and employee in large industries can only be promoted by the deliberate organization of that relationship.

That states the question I am trying to get at in this resolution. I assume the industrial conference will later enunciate their view as to how this organization of relationship between employer and employee is to be accomplished. I fail to see just how we can have industrial courts without an industrial code, which shall set forth the fundamentals as to "the right relationship between employer and employee," and I do not see how this troublesome question can ever be settled until there is an industrial code.

You could not well have a Congress without a Constitution or courts without a code; likewise how can you have industrial courts without an industrial code? If employer and employee could get together and agree on an industrial code, recognizing the eight-hour day, a living wage, the right of collective bargaining, and other fundamental matters, then disputes over these fundamentals could be taken care of in the industrial courts. But they can not be, and it seems to me we must solve this fundamental relationship before courts will be of practical value, and we might as well meet that question fairly and determine it.

The conference proposed in the resolution goes far beyond the present conference or the former one, which ended in disaster. It will be an industrial conference. England tried this plan, and it was successful. The first thought will be that the conference is too large, but you must have a conference representing practically every line of industry and of labor. They will spend a week or two, as they did in England, arguing and discussing, and then get down to fundamentals through committees. The creation of a national labor board will help in solving these problems until such time as the national industrial congress provided for in the resolution shall make its report to Congress.

I desired to say these few words with reference to the resolution I submitted this morning.

REPLY TO THE CHARGES AGAINST THE COPPER PRODUCERS.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have here a copy of an article which appeared in the Engineering and Mining Journal of January 13, written by Mr. Walter Douglas, of Arizona. Mr. Douglas is engaged in the production of copper in the Southwest, and he and the other copper producers of this country were recently made the objects of bitter attacks. It seems to me but fair that the copper producers who have been attacked should have some opportunity to reply, as nearly as possible in the same forum where the attack has been made. So I ask unanimous consent to include in the RECORD a copy of the article written by Mr. Douglas.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPLY TO THE GRAHAM COMMITTEE CHARGES AGAINST COPPER PRODUCERS.

"In the New York Times of December 17 appeared an article reporting a discussion in the House of Representatives of the report of the special House Committee Investigating War Department Expenditures. This committee, commonly known as the Graham committee, submitted a report on November 11 designated as Report No. 463, from which the following is an extract:

"In the last case cited, that of the United Metals Selling Co., immense profits were made by the producers of copper by virtue of a combination of low-price copper producers, which combination was aided and encouraged by the Government, although in violation of the law of the land.

"The Times article above referred to states that Mr. GRAHAM, speaking as chairman of the committee for the Republican majority members—

"Attacked the method of sale by the War Department of 100,000,000 pounds of surplus copper held when the armistice was signed. Copper producers, he said, were paid large amounts in excess of correct amounts due for Government copper during the war.

"It appears that the producers in the sale of their product through the United Metals Co. secured great and substantial profits, and in the purchase of the surplus copper from the Government through this same single agency gained control of the market and made substantial profits upon the same a second time. The copper producers were, by combinations agreed to by the Government, enabled to secure large profits which they otherwise would not have secured. The Government also made it possible for certain copper producers to maintain and largely increase the price of copper to the public since the signing of the armistice by disposing of its surplus to a combination of such producers.

"It will undoubtedly appear to those conversant with the transactions between the copper producers and the Government during the war that a confutation of such charges would be not only unnecessary but entirely superfluous; unfortunately, however, the general public is not in a position to know the facts. The inference, whether intentional or not, in the statement in Report No. 463 that 'In some of the cases cited the committee is of the opinion that constructive if not actual fraud occurred, vitiating settlements,' places the producers in a position which they are unwilling to accept, and which is not in accordance with the evidence placed before the committee.

"In this report two alleged facts are complained of: First, that immense profits were made by copper producers; and, second, that such profits resulted from a combination of low-price producers, which combination was, though illegal, aided and abetted by the Government.

"First as to immense profits:

"It might be interesting to sketch briefly the market fluctuations in the price of the metal throughout the period of war. At the outbreak of hostilities in 1914, due to the cessation of export trade, which had absorbed over 50 per cent of the output, the price rapidly fell to 11 cents per pound, or below the cost of production. In 1915 the war demand began to be felt, and at the close of that year the price rose to 22½ cents. In 1916 the demand became increasingly urgent, and the price advanced to an average for the year of 27.202 cents. At the beginning of 1917 the price was over 30 cents per pound, and forward contracts for the first quarter were executed at from 31 to 33 cents.

"About this time, in conformity with the then preparedness plans of this country, the Government approached some of the large producers for a price and immediate delivery on a considerable tonnage of copper for the Army and Navy. As indicative of the loyal desire of the whole industry to cooperate, this metal was furnished at 16⅜ cents per pound, or the average selling price for the previous 10 years, although copper was at the time selling for over 30 cents. There was much criticism of this transaction, but if it was an error it was certainly one of the heart and marked the inception of an era of closest mutual cooperation with the administration.

"On our entry into the war the Government adopted a policy of price fixing and one of the earliest commodities to be affected was copper. As it became known that nonessential industries would be forbidden the metal and that our Government would fix the price not only for its own requirements but for the allied powers, the price declined after March, and electrolytic copper was selling for slightly over 26 cents, when the price-fixing committee of the War Industries Board, on September 21, 1917, fixed the price at 23½ cents per pound, with the added condition that wages, which were based on a sliding scale equivalent to a 26-cent market, should not be reduced. In spite of increased costs of production, this price maintained until July 2, 1918, when the Government granted an increase of 2½ cents to compensate for increased freight rates and wages and a higher toll to refiners. The 26-cent price remained to the close of the war.

"While comparisons are odious to those in whose favor they do not trend, may it not be pertinent to compare the relative advance in copper to that in other commodities? As before stated, the selling price of copper was 16⅜ cents for the 10 years prior to our entry into the war. The Graham committee report covers transactions only since the United States became a party to the struggle. Therefore the percentage of increase was for the first 15 months 41 per cent and for the last 4 months 56 per cent. Does this, under the conditions of high labor and material costs, 60 per cent increase in freights and the admitted inefficiency of labor, indicate profiteering?

"During the period under consideration wheat sold at an average price of $2.03 per bushel, or 110 per cent above the 10-year prewar price. Pig iron sold at a price 129 per cent above the prewar average; structural steel, 120 per cent; and lead, 72 per cent—to cite only a few other essential commodities.

"As apparently so-called 'low-price' copper producers, which may be assumed to mean 'low cost,' have been singled out for special attack, it is surely unnecessary to point out that those mines so gifted by nature with conditions which permit the extraction of the metal cheaply, were penalized by an 80 per cent war-profit tax, thus placing them on an equality with those less favorably endowed.

"The Federal Trade Commission in its report of June 30, 1919, entitled 'Copper,' gave the average costs of all the American companies for the year 1918 as 16.17 cents, allowing only seven-tenths of a cent for depletion and excluding all except local State taxes. It might also be stated, as pointed out by the commission, that charges for exploration and development work during this period were almost negligible owing to shortage of labor. As the Federal corporation and excess-profits taxes, properly falling most heavily on the low-cost producers and those who are charged in the Graham report with having entered into an illegal combination with the connivance of the Government, will probably be about 2½ cents per pound of copper, the margin of profit since the United States entered the war will not have averaged that of prewar years, while since the armistice such metal as has been sold has not paid for the cost of extraction.

"As to the charge that 'immense profits were made by the producers of copper by virtue of a combination of the low-price producers, which combination was aided and encouraged by the Government, although in violation of the law of the land,' it should only be necessary to explain the machinery devised by the War Industries Board to show the absurdity of the allegation.

"When the Government took practical charge of the industry it utilized the highly developed selling organizations of the United Metals Selling Co. and the American Smelting & Refining Co.; the former for the distribution of copper for domestic consumption and the latter for the export business. A committee known as the copper producers' committee was formed, consisting of the representatives of all the important selling agencies. This committee, acting under the instructions of the War Industries Board, and being itself practically a Government agency, allocated to the allied nations and the domestic consumers their respective proportions of output as directed. The United Metals Selling Co. and the American Smelting & Refining Co. actually donated, without expense to the Government or the other producers, the services of their specialized and efficient organizations to simplify the very complicated object desired. Surely there was nothing illegal nor in restraint of trade in such an arrangement, which constituted simply a means for equitable and intelligent distribution of product, without power or initiative even to consider the question of price.

"On the presentation of the committee report to Congress on December 16 Mr. GRAHAM attacked the War Department and the United Metals Selling Co. for what he termed was a means by which it was made possible 'for certain copper producers to maintain and largely increase the price of copper to the public since the signing of the armistice by disposing of its surplus to a combination of such producers.' The facts, which are of record in the files of the committee, are as follows:

"At the conclusion of hostilities the Government found itself in possession of approximately 100,000,000 pounds of refined copper, brass, and scrap, which it was anxious to dispose of. Not desiring to create an abnormal condition by flooding the market, which would have depressed the price and caused a serious financial loss, the Government entered into an arrangement with all the producers through the United Metals Selling Co. whereby this surplus stock should be sold along with that in the hands of the producers in proportion to the ratio which the Government stock bore to that of the producers. By this means the surplus was sold and the same price realized as was received by all the other selling agencies, so that the Government will have obtained approximately 17½ cents per pound for its surplus, which, while undoubtedly representing a loss as compared to the price paid, was far more than would have been received had these holdings been dumped upon an already overstocked market in one lot. As the average price obtained for copper was, as before stated, 17½ cents since the armistice, which is admittedly below the average cost of production, the 'great and substantial profits' complained of by Mr. GRAHAM are hard to visualize.

"It is conceivable that a Nation, organized administratively for peace conditions only, when confronted with the problems which presented themselves in the spring of 1917, might naturally have experienced extreme difficulty in perfecting an organization competent to obtain full value for its expenditures. There were bound to be wasteful and extravagant contracts made by inexperienced and zealous agents of the Government, and it is undoubtedly proper and desirable that full investigation of war expenditures should be made in order to ascertain if any taint of fraud existed in connection with such transactions. The American public wants no whitewashing of fraudulent or even doubtful contracts, nor will it stand for charges, definite or implied, which can not be substantiated by facts and which have been spread broadcast for purely partisan reasons.

"The copper producers invite the most searching and public investigation of their relation with the Government, confident that any unprejudiced tribunal will decide that the charges made by the Graham committee are false and vicious and circulated solely and purely for campaign purposes."

LEAGUE OF NATIONS COVENANT.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial by Mr. Bryan commenting on an amendment which I offered to the League of Nations covenant, together with a letter which I will furnish later, commenting in part upon this subject.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GORE'S REFERENDUM AMENDMENT.

"On another page will be found an extract from Senator GORE'S speech, made during the treaty discussion in advocacy of an advisory vote on war. His amendment was voted down, but the vote does not indicate the real attitude of the Senate on the subject. The Democrats who were likely to favor Mr. GORE'S amendment were restrained from voting for it while they were endeavoring to secure ratification without reservations. And then, too, there would be some hesitancy about forcing such a provision on all the nations even though our Senators might unanimously favor an application of the principles to our own Nation.

"The principle for which Senator GORE contends is entirely sound and ought to be adopted by this country, and ought also be brought before the League of Nations by our delegates. If there is any merit at all in the doctrine that governments must derive their just powers from the consent of the governed, surely the governed ought to have the right to decide for themselves, by popular vote, a question as important as going to war. No other subject comes so near to the people. It has long been the custom to submit constitutional amendments to a popular vote, and in cities bond issues and grants of franchises are submitted to popular vote. If people have the right to be heard on such questions, how much greater is their right to be heard on questions that involve their lives and the exercising of the taxing power as it is employed in time of war. A referendum on war would give greater assurance of peace than any other provision that could be made. With the advent of women into politics the argument in favor of a referendum gathers additional strength and the probability of a peaceful solution of international difficulties increases. Senator GORE should not be discouraged by the defeat of his resolution; the principle is right, and a righteous principle always triumphs finally.

"W. J. BRYAN."

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

So Mr. HALE's motion was rejected.

ADMIRAL WILLIAM S. SIMS.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate Senate resolution 287, which went over yesterday under the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I had heard no announcement of the Chair to that effect.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; a vote has been taken since the morning business closed. It will require a motion to take up this resolution.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I move, then, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 287.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WADSWORTH. What is the motion?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 287.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, let the resolution be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be stated.

The resolution (S. Res. 287) submitted by Mr. WALSH of Montana on the 21st instant was read, as follows:

Whereas at the hearing being conducted by a subcommittee of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate on January 17, 1920, Admiral William S. Sims being under examination, he offered and there was received in evidence and thus became public a copy of a letter theretofore addressed by him to the Secretary of the Navy, in which, among other things, the writer said:

"6. In the latter part of March, 1917, in response to a request from the American ambassador in London, expressing the desire of the British Government that a naval officer of high rank be sent to secure the closer cooperation which our Navy Department had suggested, I was ordered abroad on barely 48 hours' notice.

"7. Brief orders were delivered to me verbally in Washington. No formal instructions or statement of the Navy Department's plans or policy were received at that time, though I received the following explicit admonition: 'Don't let the British pull the wool over your eyes. It is none of our business pulling their chestnuts out of the fire. We would as soon fight the British as the Germans.'"

And

Whereas the said Secretary of the Navy has, through the public press, explicitly denied having given to Admiral Sims the alleged admonition, to wit:

"Don't let the British pull the wool over your eyes. It is none of our business pulling their chestnuts out of the fire. We would as soon fight the British as the Germans."

And

Whereas it is apparent that if such an admonition was given to the said Admiral Sims at the time and under the circumstances detailed it was and must have been understood by him to have been highly confidential: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is hereby declared to be the sense of the Senate that the disclosure of the alleged admonition by Admiral Sims, constituting, if given, a part of the secret instructions of an officer of the United States Navy on the eve of his departure on a mission of the highest importance and most extreme delicacy, merits universal and unqualified reprobation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Montana that the Senate proceed to consider the resolution which has just been read.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. LODGE called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

SHIPPING BOARD CLAIMS.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, I wish to make a very brief statement about a measure which I am going to ask the Senate to consider at this time. I believe it to be of sufficient importance to have immediate consideration.

The purpose of the bill is to fulfill an obligation which the United States in good faith owes to certain builders of wooden ships, and the justice of this measure will be apparent when the facts are understood. When Congress declared war against Germany our most immediate need was for ships, because without them neither our men nor our supplies could be rendered available in Europe. Confronting that condition, the Government sought to procure the establishment of shipbuilding plants, and men were sent into all parts of the country for the purpose of holding public and semipublic meetings at which the absolute necessity of having ships was explained, and the people were urged in the most earnest way to provide for building them. An appeal was not only made to the patriotism of the people as an inducement for them to establish and equip shipbuilding plants, but they were assured that the Government would protect them against loss and allow them a fair profit on their investment. All of the shipbuilding yards for the relief of which this bill is intended were constructed and equipped under such circumstances.

Contracts for building ships were, in time, made with these companies, though in many instances the work had been progressing for weeks or even months without any contract and upon the assurances given by letters or by telegrams or in personal conferences. The first contracts obligated the Government to pay the cost of building the ships, plus 10 per cent; but that form of contract was soon superseded by a contract to pay a certain sum which it was calculated by the Government experts would return a profit ranging from $30,000 to $42,000, depending on freight rates, which in turn depended on the proximity of the plants to the materials and the supplies which they required. The building on the Pacific coast was, with two or three exceptions, done under lump-sum contracts; but on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts the lump-sum contracts were soon superseded by contracts to pay the cost of the ships plus a fixed fee of $15,000 per hull, $7,000 of which was intended to cover yard depreciation and $8,000 was intended as compensation for the service. Every contract did not follow these terms precisely, but the few exceptional cases vary from them very little.

These shipbuilding companies were assured by the Government that their yards would be given work enough to fully return the investment, with a fair compensation, but they were not given contracts in the beginning for such a number of ships as would fulfill that assurance, because the policy of the board was to give a contract for a certain number of ships, and when that was finished a contract for a further number. That policy was based upon the belief of the board that the companies would exert themselves to complete each contract in order that they might obtain a further contract.

When the armistice was signed the Government immediately abandoned the construction of wooden ships, and canceled all contracts for them, thus saving a sum estimated by the chairman of the Shipping Board at between $125,000,000 and $130,000,000. The Government fully recognized, however, that it was obligated, in good faith, to keep not only its contracts with but also its assurances to those companies, and a board of cancellation was immediately organized by the Emergency Fleet Corporation, instructed to settle claims on the same basis as is provided in the bill under consideration, and something like 70 claims were so settled. But with a change in the personnel of the Shipping Board, resulting in the selection of a new chairman, further settlements were suspended. The moral obligation of the Government was not disputed, but it was held that under the law as it now stands the board has no power to pay any claims except those resting on a purely legal obligation of the Government. Under this conviction the present chairman discontinued the policy of his predecessors and refused to approve any further settlements according to the admitted moral obligation of the Government. It is proper that we should say, however, that the chairman's position in that regard was purely a question of power with him; and, recognizing the justice of the claims involved, he has recommended the passage of this bill.

The evidence submitted to your committee shows that unless this bill is passed without unnecessary delay a very great hardship will be inflicted on many worthy American citizens. In a number of cases—indeed, we might say that in practically all of these cases—men have not only invested their own money in the capital stock of these companies but they have become sureties for the companies at the banks and for money borrowed wherever it could be obtained. Those obligations aggregate millions of dollars, and unless relief is afforded hundreds of men will be hopelessly bankrupted through no fault of their own, and simply because they sought to help the Government in its hour of trial, accepting its assurances in lieu of its positive contracts.

It is estimated that to settle the claims provided for in this bill will cost the Government about $15,000,000, which will be less than 40 per cent of the amount reserved by the Shipping Board for that purpose.

Accompanying the report your committee submits a printed copy of the hearings held by it while considering the bill.

The urgency of this case, I believe, demands that the bill shall have immediate consideration, and I ask unanimous consent that it be considered at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none. The Chair lays the bill before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3451) authorizing the United States Shipping Board to adjust equitable claims of wooden-ship builders arising out of the prosecution of the war, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

Mr. KING. Is the bill up for consideration?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. KING. Has the Senator from Maine moved to take it up for consideration at this time?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine obtained unanimous consent to have it taken up. The Chair made a loud inquiry as to whether there was objection, and there was none.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, on page 1, line 4, after the word "authorized," to insert the words "and directed," so as to read:

That the United States Shipping Board be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to adjust, liquidate, and pay the claims of individuals, firms, or corporations who built or contracted to build wooden ships for the United States, etc.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I hope the amendment in line 4 will be rejected. It is thoroughly out of harmony with the declared purposes of the bill. The bill is represented to be one giving authority to the Shipping Board to make these settlements. That is all that seems to be asked for. The committee comes in now and asks by this amendment to make it mandatory that the board shall proceed in accordance with the act to make settlement. I think we ought to leave something to the discretion of the board. If we grant authority, we have done everything that is necessary. I suggest the rejection of the amendment in line 4.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is it a direction by Congress to the Shipping Board to adjust, liquidate, and pay? That leaves no option.

Mr. HARDING. It is not only a direction, but it specifies the terms on which the settlement shall be made, without regard to the contract. It ought not to be in the bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That leaves no discretion to the Shipping Board.

Mr. FERNALD. It authorizes the Shipping Board to pay all just and equitable claims, and directs them to do so. I can see no objection to it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Why is it not sufficient to authorize them to take the steps? Here is an expression from Congress, which has not passed on the claims, directing the board to adjust, liquidate, and pay the claims. An authorization ought to be sufficient.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator that an authorization might enable them to proceed to adjust, liquidate, and pay, but it does not direct them to do it. There might be a question whether that would be giving them sufficient power unless Congress proceeded not only to authorize them but to direct them to adjust these claims.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the Senator permit an interruption? I understood from the statement of the Senator from Maine that the Shipping Board had been paying these claims and would be willing to pay them now if they had authority to do so. Why direct them to do it? It simply restores the power which was exercised by the former Shipping Board, but which the present chairman denies he possesses. I understood the statement of the Senator from Maine to be that all he was asking for was an authorization which would justify the Shipping Board in making payments.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am inclined to think the Shipping Board would proceed, but, as a matter of fact, some portions of these claims have been thoroughly admitted, and there is no dispute about them; yet they do not pay them. They hold those portions up until they can adjust other questions in dispute. It was for that reason, I think, that the committee thought the words "and directed" should be inserted. The chairman of the board, I am quite sure, welcomes this sort of a direction. It is not intended to compel anything that he does not want to do or does not think ought to be done. I think he feels himself that it simply strengthens the authority. The committee thought they ought to be told positively to make these adjustments and payments at once.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I think that would be a very serious error. Congress has no time to investigate and determine whether these claims should be paid. Congress can authorize the board to do it. The authority is just as sufficient to justify the act as it can be; but to direct it to do so leaves no option upon the part of the board. I think that would be a gross error.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. FERNALD. I have no objection to striking out the words "and directed." I believe it is all covered in the word "authorized." I do not think it makes any particular difference, and I will accept that suggestion.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator consents to have it stricken out, very well; but I think it would have been perfectly proper to insist that it remain there, in view of other provisions in the bill. However, I will not discuss it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask the Senator from Maine how much is involved in this proposition?

Mr. FERNALD. The chairman of the Shipping Board, I think, estimated that it is between ten and fifteen million dollars now.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is a mere estimate. It may be fifteen million and it may be a hundred and fifty million before we get through. I think no one knows what the liabilities of the Government are in connection with anything it had to do with the building of ships.

Considering the loose way in which contracts were made, the extravagances displayed along every line of contract, I have no doubt that it will be many times that amount before we get through.

Mr. President, I gave notice yesterday that I would present at the close of the routine morning business to-day some figures relating to our income as compared with our proposed expenses for the fiscal year 1921. Those remarks will have just as much bearing on the pending bill as they would upon the Kenyon Americanization bill, and I propose to place them in the RECORD at this time.

NATIONAL RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES.

Mr. President, there is a widespread opinion throughout the country that one of the pastimes indulged in by the Senate is talking against time. I am not certain that this may not be the result of my effort to-day to bring home to the Senate and to the country the most serious and threatening state of our financial affairs. Duty, however, to both the Senate and the country compels me to give, and to reiterate wherever it may be necessary, a note of warning along this line.

I am not a member of the Committee on Appropriations, but above and superior to the report of any committee is the final report of the Congress of the United States which it makes to the people of the United States. I am a Member of the Senate, and therefore justified in presenting the figures without waiting for action on the part of any Senate committee.

Mr. President, each Senate committee makes its report of the needs of the service over which it has jurisdiction, with, I am sorry to observe, very little reference to the needs of other branches of the Government which are being considered by other committees. The natural consequence is that there is no comprehensive paring of items to bring the whole within the Government's income.

The weakness in our legislative system to-day is the lack of a supervisory committee in the Senate that will assume the task of determining what is absolutely necessary in all the appropriation bills and what should be eliminated—of retaining only that which is most necessary and keeping the sum total of all the appropriations clearly within our income. That function can not be performed by the Senate as a committee of the whole, because the Senate never has more than one appropriation bill before it at any one time. It can therefore neither make adequate comparisons nor any intelligent, just, or comprehensive reductions. That result could only be obtained if all the several appropriations were combined in a single omnibus bill.

Mr. President, we will start the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1920, with a deficit of more than $3,000,000,000. Our estimated expenditures in the Book of Estimates, incomplete, but always below the actual amounts expended, propose for our consideration an expenditure which with the additional appropriations now being made will not be less than $6,000,000,000.

The total expenses to be met during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, would, therefore, in round numbers, be about $9,000,000,000.

Where will we obtain the cash to meet this demand? We must again turn to the Book of Estimates for contemplated revenues for our action. Including a return of $500,000,000 of capital stock of the Grain Corporation, the estimate of revenues, in round numbers, is $6,000,000,000.

Assuming that we would collect all of this sum, and I doubt that very much, we would still have a deficit of about $3,000,000,000. That means one of two things. We must either reduce these estimated expenses three billions or we must sell bonds and increase our permanent indebtedness another three billions. What are we going to do about it? What are our several committees which report huge appropriations going to do about it? What are Senators going to do about it? That may be answered in part by what they are doing right now, and the answer is that instead of reducing they are vastly increasing appropriations over the estimates. The House has passed the Fuller pension bill, not estimated for, which will carry an increase, in my judgment of $75,000,000. You have passed the Sweet bill, which carries probably another $80,000,000. You have just passed the Great Falls water-power bill, carrying $25,000,000.

So here we go, Mr. President, like a blind man rushing toward a precipice, seemingly oblivious to the financial abyss toward which we are heading.

I recognize that the indulgence in mere criticism of extravagances leads nowhere. I realize that what we want is a concrete statement of what items in the estimates can be dispensed with, to the end that our expenses shall be kept within our revenues. And if I felt that I was unable to meet that requirement I should not address the Senate on the subject.

I propose, therefore, to go into some little detail in presenting to the Senate a number of reductions that can and ought to be made. The only general statement that I shall make is that every estimate in excess of that required for the year ending June 30, 1920, except those where by law added duties are imposed or increased wages or salaries provided, should be eliminated. There should be no extension of Government activities in any line until our revenues overtake our present expenses.

And right here, Mr. President, I am compelled to note and enter upon the record a visual phenomenon peculiar to both branches of Congress, namely, that we can see very little things much more distinctly than we can see very large things, a reversal of nature's ordinary rule. And so we often spend weeks in battling to save a few thousand dollars and allow items amounting to hundreds of millions and even billions to pass without challenge or careful investigation. We are altogether too much inclined to be penny wise and pound foolish. Mr. President, we have outlived the old proverb, "Take care of the pennies and the dollars will take care of themselves." The proverb that would apply to present-day exigencies would read: Take care of the billions and the millions will take care of themselves.

We can not meet the present situation by the mere paring down of appropriation bills. We have simply got to cut out entirely many of the items entering into the estimates. We must apply an ax and not a drawshave.

I know of no better way to clearly bring into view the excrescences that have grown into enormous dimensions, and which invite the saw and the ax and not merely a manicure set, than to present in a table, for the purpose of comparison, some of the leading items of Government expenditures for the year ending June 30, 1915, with the estimates for the same items for the year ending June 30, 1921, one period nearly normal, before we were greatly affected by the World War, and one year beginning 21 months after the termination of the war and ending 2 years and 9 months after its termination. Certainly this last period is sufficiently remote from the war to demand a return to normal conditions. Mr. President, I here ask consent to have the table inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMITH of South Carolina in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

Total recapitulation by departments.

Total	5,246,696,358.62

Other deficiencies will bring the grand total to about $6,000,000,000.

Mr. McCUMBER. It needs but a glance at this table to indicate where the economy ax should be applied. We need not now bother ourselves with the few millions of dollars advance indicated here and there in this table. All of them put together would not make an appreciable showing in the enormous deficit which confronts us. Let us examine the big items.

We find that the estimates for the Treasury Department have advanced from $148,823,000 in 1915 to $1,674,000,000 for 1921, an increase of $1,526,000,000. Of course the principal part of this increase is the interest on war debt. The interest on our public debt which entered into the 1915 appropriation was about $23,000,000; interest estimated for 1921, $1,017,000,000. But after deducting this excess of interest we still have for the ordinary expenses $572,000,000 for the year 1921 as compared with $148,823,000 for the year 1915, or approximately an increase of $420,000,000 in the ordinary expenses. You ought to save right here not less than $300,000,000.

I next come to the item, "Independent offices." The appropriation for 1915 for this item was $5,341,000. This year the estimate is $506,750,000, an increase of 10,000 per cent. What makes up this vast increase from about $5,000,000 to $506,000,000? The one grand item is the estimate for the Shipping Board, $447,000,000. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] proposes to increase it immediately by this bill by another $15,000,000. Every dollar of this can be cut out. The most shameful of all of our criminal extravagances have been the expenses of building our ships. The Government can not operate them, private individuals can not purchase them at Government cost, and the whole scheme is to run the Government into this new field of wild and extravagant paternalism.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. KING. As I understood the Senator's last statement, it was to the effect that private parties could not purchase these Government-owned ships. My understanding was that the board had determined to dispose of the ships. If they have not done so, I am inclined to think that Congress ought to take some steps to see that they shall act in a proper and legitimate way in the disposition of the ships.

Mr. McCUMBER. They are attempting to dispose of them. They can not dispose of them at a sum approaching the fearful cost that they have placed upon them; and so they have proposed that they will count off a billion dollars in cost; but even after allowing a billion dollars reduction, the price is so much higher than that for which they can be constructed by private individuals that they are receiving no demand for them.

Mr. KING. I agree with the Senator that something ought to be done toward a liquidation of the entire accounts of this great Federal agency. I know that the expenses incurred in the operation of these ships is wholly indefensible. I know, at least it is my information, that vessels are leased by the Shipping Board to some private persons who are operating their own ships, and that they so manipulate the operation of the Government vessels as that the profitable cargoes are shipped in their own boats and the unprofitable ones in the boats of the Government. The Government suffers, as it always will when it attempts to engage in activities which belong to private enterprise.

Mr. McCUMBER. We, of course, can not undo the evil extravagances which have heaped this enormous loss upon the Government. What we can do, however, is to cut out any future extravagances. We do not need to make this extra expenditure of $447,000,000. We had better shut up our shop right now and stop this expense. We will save at least $447,000,000 of contemplated Government expenses, and we can save enough more out of the Shipping Board to make another $500,000,000 of expenses saved to the Government. I am trying here to show wherein we can save from two billion to two and one-half billion dollars out of our estimates.

Our experience in operating our railways under Government ownership ought to be sufficient to force the elimination of that entire amount. The Shipping Board should be closed as quickly as the Government can close it. We can easily save out of this item for independent offices $500,000,000 and still leave a million more than our 1915 appropriation. We next examine the War Department. The appropriations for 1915 were $155,525,000. For 1921, a period that will end nearly three years after the termination of the war, we call for $1,208,901,000, an increase of $1,053,376,000. As this does not include any increase in the salaries of officers, to say the very least we ought to cut this down about $700,000,000.

A large part of this estimate is for fortifications, military posts, and so forth, $139,296,000. These should be cut out. They should not be thought of at this time. We have a number of vacant military posts. We have all the buildings and structures erected in this country during the war which are vacant and rotting to-day and can be used for posts.

There is not a country in Europe to-day that could make war on us, and there will not be one that can conduct a war for 50 years. All these extra appropriations can wait until we can afford to pay for them.

We next examine the Navy Department. Until we can secure a degree at least of decent international behavior by a compact of all the great nations, of course we must build warships and prepare to destroy each other, and we must keep abreast of the necessity of the hour. But, Mr. President, with every nation in Europe practically bankrupt, the necessity of the hour does not demand the vast increase in battleships asked for. We do not need to expend as much as we expended in 1915, because the possibility of another war is far more remote than it was in 1915.

In 1915 we expended for our Navy Department $147,294,000; we ask for this coming year $580,674,000; we can easily save right here another $400,000,000.

Our present appropriation bill calls for $75,000,000 to be expended in good roads by the Government. That ought to be eliminated until we can afford to pay for this luxury.

There was appropriated for public works under the War Department last year $54,000,000; this year the estimate is $194,000,000. If we hold to last year's appropriation, we can save $140,000,000 right here.

The War Department asks for $10,000,000 for vocational training of soldiers, as against $2,000,000 asked last year.

The Vocational Education Bureau asks for $21,000,000 for rehabilitation for soldiers injured during the war. Much of the expense incurred for slight injuries in sending doctors and lawyers and others to college might, in my opinion, be saved.

Other minor items that could be dispensed with are:

Public buildings	$10,000,000
Rivers and harbors	60,000,000
Public works	31,000,000
Torpedo boats	23,000,000
Armor for vessels	49,000,000

From the best information I can get we can dispense with about 50,000 clerks in our departments, with a saving of $60,000,000.

A recapitulation of the most important reductions would show:

Treasury Department	$300,000,000
Independent offices, including Shipping Board	500,000,000
War Department	700,000,000
Navy Department	400,000,000
Reduction in clerical service	60,000,000
Total	1,960,000,000

With careful reduction along other lines indicated we could easily bring about a total reduction of $2,250,000,000 without the Government suffering in the least.

Mr. President, the country is longing for a return to something like normal conditions; but the people as a whole can not possibly return to a normal state so long as the Government keeps up this abnormal extravagance. Government extravagances are solely responsible for the high cost of living to-day, which, when analyzed, mean nothing more or less than that we are indulging in a wild orgy of spending borrowed money. The first great necessary step is to stop borrowing, but to stop borrowing we must stop spending, and to stop the spending we must stop unnecessary appropriations.

Mr. President, I am fully aware that we can hardly look for anything more than a mild sympathy in the several committees which are to pass judgment on what each department shall be allowed; but I know without any greatly refined process of reasoning that the Government can operate and function with an expenditure of not to exceed three times what we expended in 1915. And if we do that we can easily keep within our income.

Let us make allowance for $1,000,000,000 extra expense of interest. Let us assume that our expenses in 1915 were $1,000,000,000 in round numbers. Suppose we double it, and we have $2,000,000,000; and there is no excuse on earth for more than doubling the ordinary expenses of the Government over the expenses of 1915. That would bring us to such a point that instead of being two or three billion dollars above our income we could cut our taxes about $2,000,000,000.

One of the great difficulties we encounter whenever we make any systematic effort at economy, as I have suggested, lies in the fact that one committee can not refuse to allow items in a bill before it which it considers of more or less grave importance when other committees report bills carrying heavy appropriations which the first-named committee considers of far less importance. I might here give an illustration.

Unquestionably good roads are needed throughout the country. But, like many other good things, we can get along without them, as we have heretofore done, if we have not the money to pay for them. The good-roads movement will cost the Government for 1921 $75,000,000.

Now, because of the awful extravagances of the Government just at a time when the old soldiers of the Civil War are on the brink of the grave, when they are less able to care for themselves, we have increased their burden in the higher cost of living at least twofold. We have increased the wages of railway and other employees to meet the higher cost of living. These old veterans certainly have a just right to say that if we can spend $75,000,000 in good roads for the year 1921 we can add $75,000,000 to just put them where they were before we added to their burdens. These old veterans are as patriotic as when they fought to uphold the Union from 1861 to 1865. If 300,000 of their comrades died to save the Union, so in the Government's present extremity most of the survivors would be willing to suffer privations down to their last breath if necessary. But I for one should never consent that their needs should be denied so long as a single one of these extravagant and unnecessary appropriations is voted by the Senate.

Mr. President, I am appealing for united action on the part of the Senate itself to eliminate from our appropriations everything not absolutely necessary, to the end that we may keep within our income without a further increase of taxes or a further issuance of bonds. And I especially appeal to the Republican Members of Congress, members of that party which is responsible for any failure to meet the necessity of the hour, to unite in a determination to check all further governmental extravagances.

Mr. President, for the use of the Senate, I desire to present and have printed as an appendix to these remarks certain other memoranda and tables which, I think, will be useful to Senators in ascertaining wherein we may make necessary reductions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted.

Of this amount $50,000,000 was made immediately available for the year ending June 30, 1919; $75,000,000 for the year ending June 30, 1920; $75,000,000 for the year ending June 30, 1921; and in addition there was another $9,000,000 appropriated, $3,000,000 for each of the three years, for survey and building roads and trails in forest reserves.

For public printing and binding the estimate for 1921 is $10,770,000, as against $7,346,000 appropriated for last year.
A large amount of this printing and binding is useless. Every department has an editorial staff, whose sole duties are to carry on a propaganda for expansion of that department.
On Dec. 24 the President signed the Sweet bill, amending the war-risk insurance so that a soldier of this war will receive for total disability from $80 to $100 per month instead of $30 per month under the original act, increasing appropriations (estimated) over what they would have been had this law not been enacted		80,000,000
The water-power bill has just been passed, carrying with it an appropriation for utilizing the power of Great Falls for Washington of		25,000,000
This could have been postponed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall suggest the absence of a quorum, unless the Senator from Maine desires to speak now.

Mr. FERNALD. No.

Mr. KING. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brandegee	Hale	McKellar	Smoot
Calder	Harding	New	Spencer
Capper	Harris	Newberry	Sterling
Chamberlain	Henderson	Norris	Trammell
Colt	Hitchcock	Overman	Wadsworth

Dial	Kenyon	Sheppard	Warren
Fernald	King	Sherman	Wolcott
Fletcher	Lenroot	Shields
France	Lodge	Smith, Md.
Gore	McCumber	Smith, S. C.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The Assistant Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. KENDRICK, Mr. OWEN, and Mr. SMITH of Georgia answered to their names when called.

Mr. HARRISON, Mr. POMERENE, Mr. SUTHERLAND, Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. NELSON, Mr. CULBERSON, Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. NUGENT, and Mr. UNDERWOOD entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is on the amendment of the committee, on page 1, line 4, after the word "authorized" to insert the words "and directed."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the measure under consideration was introduced in this body November 19, 1919, and reported from the Committee on Commerce on the 21st instant. I doubt whether any of the Members of the Senate, other than the Committee on Commerce, knew of this bill until it was called up for consideration a few moments ago by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD].

It is impossible, Mr. President, to intelligently or fairly discuss a measure of such importance without having had an opportunity to become familiar with its provisions and to learn the purpose for which it was designed and the evils which it seeks to remedy. I have had no opportunity to even read all of its provisions, and it is quite likely that some of my observations and criticisms may be unwarranted and unfair. However, I feel that legislation of this character, which may establish a precedent of far-reaching consequences, should be carefully considered, and that we should not pass them in a perfunctory manner.

Mr. President, a hasty perusal of some of the provisions of this measure have impressed me with the view that it was rather hurriedly prepared and does not sufficiently protect the interests of the Government. It is unfortunate that the committee did not submit a full and detailed report, so that Senators might be advised of all questions connected with the proposed legislation.

I understand the bill is for the purpose of liquidating claims against the United States, some of which may be founded upon contracts, express or implied, some of which may rest in nubibus, in the imagination of individuals, upon grounds which are uncertain and indefinite and having no legal sanction. It also appears that it is absolutely impossible for anyone to determine the amount of the claims.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD], who reported the bill, has just stated that his information is that they will not exceed $15,000,000. As stated, there is no report accompanying the bill, and Senators are wholly at sea as to the expenditures which will be called for under the provisions of the bill. It may be $15,000,000 or it may be $50,000,000.

We know, from newspaper statements and otherwise, that many wooden ships were constructed, and that contracts for a large number were canceled. The keels of some of these ships were never laid; some were in process of construction. I have been advised that some yards were completed for the construction of wooden ships, under no valid contracts with the Government, but in anticipation that contracts for the construction of wooden ships would be entered into with representatives of the United States; and that after the yards were constructed and the armistice was declared work upon the yards was suspended and no ships were constructed.

My information is that there will be claims for damages against the Government aggregating millions of dollars, for which, in justice and equity, the Government should not be held accountable. Some yards were completed and ships partially, and, indeed, some entirely completed. Claims will be made by the owners of those yards against the Government. I am afraid, Mr. President, that there will be some persons who built yards for the construction of wooden ships, whether ships were completed or not, and who were not authorized to engage in the enterprise, who will attribute the undertaking to some fanciful statement or promise made by the Government. It has been claimed that some persons or corporations, partially influenced by patriotic motives, and partially influenced by a desire for gain, which was entirely legitimate, undertook the construction of shipyards for the building of wooden ships, and when the armistice came they concluded that they would not prosecute their work further. Indeed, the record of the wooden ships during the war was of such a character as to demonstrate the futility of their construction. This seems to be the day of the steel ship, not the wooden vessel. It may be that some individuals who constructed yards, or attempted to build ships as a business venture, will seek to attach a liability to the Government under this bill, and to put their hands into the Treasury of the United States for large amounts.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I want to call the Senator's attention to the situation. Those people had contracts with the Government for building wooden ships. It was estimated by the Shipping Board itself, according to the claims presented to the committee, and which, so far as I know, have never been questioned, that the Government, without having authority to do so under the contracts which they had entered into with the wooden-ship contractors, would save from $125,000,000 to $130,000,000 by canceling those contracts, which they proceeded to do when the armistice was signed. That was over and above any possible claim or estimate or allowance to the contractors covering these claims and all other claims that they might have under the contracts.

I call the Senators' attention to the fact that the Shipping Board, without express provision in the contracts giving them that power or authority, deliberately canceled those contracts, and nobody is finding any fault with them particularly, because it saved the Government $125,000,000 to $130,000,000, according to their statement, over and above what they estimated would properly, reasonably, and justly compensate the contractors for the construction of wooden ships. So the Government took the matter in their own hands by canceling contracts which had no provision for such cancellation, and saved the Government from $125,000,000 to $130,000,000 over and above these claims.

Why should not claims be properly and reasonably adjusted on a fair and equitable basis? That is the situation as disclosed by the hearings. Extensive hearings were had before the Commerce Committee, and I call the Senator's attention to them; they are printed. That situation appears in the hearings at pages 26, 27, and 28.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would be the last man in the world to deny any person who has a legitimate claim against the Government the opportunity or the forum in which to present and litigate such claim.

If the Government of the United States entered into valid contracts with individuals for the construction of yards or wooden ships, and the Government broke the contracts to the damage of the contracting parties, the Government, of course, should pay for all damages sustained, even though the yards and ships are now of but little or no value. But I am concerned in finding a proper tribunal, surrounded with proper limitations, in which all individuals may litigate their claims and have justice done to them. I would not deprive any person of a single cent to which he is honestly entitled from the Government; but what I am protesting against, Mr. President, is the loose character of the legislation which is submitted here, if I am able to understand the purport of the bill, and the failure of the committee to properly guard the interests of the United States.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Was not a similar bill passed through Congress to adjust all claims that arose out of the war?

Mr. KING. I sent for the bill the Senator refers to a moment ago and I am going to allude to it a little later. I have it here before me.

Mr. HARRISON. That is true, is it not?

Mr. KING. I have stated to the Senator that the bill is before me and I shall allude to it. I will state, however, that it differs materially from this bill and protects the Government better than this bill.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. FERNALD. I am exceedingly sorry that the Senator has not read the pending bill, because the very point he is making and the argument he is making so eloquently are covered in the first 20 lines of the bill, which are to the effect that nothing but just and equitable claims are to be considered. It is plainly stated in the bill, and if the Senator would read it I believe he would withdraw any objection that he has along those lines.

Mr. KING. I have read all the bill but the last page, and I will read that before I take my seat, if I have an opportunity, even though I shall be compelled to read it to the Senator.

Mr. President, the Senator calls attention to the first section. Let us see what that section is. First, it "directs" the Shipping Board to go out and liquidate and settle claims. It would seem as if its duty was to hunt up claimants against the Government. It is not sufficient for claimants to assert their claims against the Government, but the board is directed to adjust and liquidate claims.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3315) to promote Americanization by providing for cooperation with the several States in the education of non-English-speaking persons and the assimilation of foreign-born residents, and for other purposes.

Mr. KING. Automatically, I presume, I would be taken from the floor at this time?

Mr. KENYON. No; I do not wish to do that.

Mr. KING. That is to say, automatically the bill of which the Senator from Iowa is in charge would displace the pending measure?

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. KING. So if I proceed in the discussion, it would be under the Americanization bill. I think, while I have the floor, if the Senator from Iowa will pardon me, in order that the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] may have my views in regard to the bill which I have been discussing, I shall call his attention to some of the features which I deem objectionable.

The next provision I call the Senator's attention to is on line 4, page 1, where these words appear:

> They are permitted to adjust, liquidate, and pay the claims of individuals, firms, or corporations who built or contracted to build wooden ships for the United States, the United States Shipping Board, or the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation after April 6, 1917, which can not be paid under the law as it now is.

It is obvious that the law under which some persons entered into contracts or "built" wooden ships gives no ground for relief against the Government. In other words, this bill is to validate or legalize claims which have no legal foundation. I have not examined the various measures now upon the statute books under which legitimate claims growing out of breaches of contract by the Government may be presented to the Court of Claims, but I am inclined to think if there is a valid contract existing between any individual and the Government growing out of the construction of vessels or shipyards, an opportunity now exists under existing law to present claims for damages and to have them adjusted and paid.

The next point to which I direct the Senator's attention is, on page 2, lines 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8, where I find stricken out what I regard as a proper provision which was in the bill as it was introduced. The words stricken out are as follows:

> Provided, That no claim shall be liquidated or paid unless it is alleged and found to be based upon a request or demand of the United States Shipping Board, the United States Emergency Fleet Corporation, or a representative of them or either of them.

It seems to be the intention in eliminating these words to allow claims against the Government and to compel their payment, though there was no valid contract entered into between the man who built the yard or built the ship and a duly accredited representative of the Government.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. As a member of the Senate Committee on Commerce, I attended those hearings, and I will say to the Senator that that language was stricken out by reason of the restricted, technical, and narrow construction given to a definition of the word "representative" by Judge Payne, chairman of the Shipping Board. When the question was propounded to him he said he thought the word "representative" would apply only to the personnel of the Shipping Board—the president or vice president of the Emergency Fleet Corporation. It is plain, if the Senator has given the matter, as I have no doubt he has, careful and thorough thought, that nearly all these shipyards are in zones or districts, with what we call district managers in charge, through whom the orders were made and through whom the voice of the Shipping Board spoke.

Necessarily, the changes in the program, the modifications in the style of architecture of the vessels, were dictated to a very great extent by those regional or district managers. In view of the very narrow definition placed by Judge Payne upon the word "representative," it was thought best to strike it out. In order to meet the situation that is presented by the Senator from Utah, I have suggested an amendment which I have not yet disclosed.

Mr. KING. To make it read "accredited representative"?

Mr. McNARY. No. I had considered that; but I want to follow the mineral act, which I like much better. After the word "Corporation," in line 8, page 2, I propose to insert the words "or any officer or agent acting under its authority, direction, or instruction." Those are the words used in the mineral act. That would cover the objection made by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him at this point, I think the provision which has been eliminated should be retained in the bill, and that the words "and accredited" should precede the word "representative," so that it will read:

> Provided, That no claim shall be liquidated or paid unless it is alleged and found to be based upon a request or demand of the United States Shipping Board, the United States Emergency Fleet Corporation, or an accredited representative of them or either of them.

However, the words just suggested by the Senator from Oregon seem to meet the objection urged; certainly they will greatly improve the bill and provide some safeguards for the Government.

Mr. McNARY. I will say to the Senator, if he will pardon me until I conclude, that I had the word "accredited" placed there this morning, thinking, perhaps, that there should be a reinstatement of that provision; but after I obtained the mineral act I thought I would use the same language, so there would be uniformity of expression in the statute pertaining to the particular situation.

Mr. KING. I desire to invite the attention of the Senator from Oregon to a situation with which he is entirely familiar. He will agree with me that we should be exceedingly careful in enacting legislation of this character because of the precedent which will be established. Let me illustrate.

The Department of Agriculture and the Food Administration representatives soon after we entered the war began a campaign, and a very proper one, throughout the United States to induce the people to produce the food necessary to sustain ourselves as well as our allies. Representatives of the Agricultural Department and of the Food Administration visited—I was about to say every hamlet in the United States, but, at any rate, they visited every State and every county of every State, and came in contact directly with thousands of individuals. They importuned them to produce potatoes and other vegetables, wheat and corn and all forms of agricultural crops. They went to the woolgrowers and urged them to grow sheep to produce more wool, in order that clothing might be provided for our soldiers who had crossed the sea and for our allies. They went into Arizona and told farmers there to grow long-staple cotton, that it was indispensable in the production of aircraft and other war materials. Men plowed up other crops and planted their farms, in many instances, to the crop desired by the Government. The result was, as Senators know, that hundreds of thousands of agriculturists in the United States and stock growers and others who produced for the winning of the war sustained serious losses.

The long-staple cotton men, I remember, came here to Washington soon after the termination of the war and laid the situation before the War Department and importuned them to grant some relief. None could be granted, notwithstanding those individuals had been appealed to directly by representatives of the Government and had responded to their requests. It was held that there was no valid contract, no binding contract, under which the Government was liable.

I recall that the distinguished junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] stated that in his section of the State many persons produced large quantities of potatoes at the direct request of representatives of the Government and they lost thousands of dollars. There were no purchasers for the potatoes. In the State of Idaho hundreds of thousands of bushels of potatoes were lost because of the lack of market and the imperfect system of transportation. The farmers had patriotically undertaken to produce what the officials of the Government had asked them to grow, but their losses were never paid and never will be.

Hundreds of thousands of people were compelled to close their business enterprises because it was alleged they were producing nonessentials. Their losses are hundreds of millions of dollars.

I merely instance those cases for the purpose of showing that legislation of this character should be carefully scrutinized and the interests of the Government should be carefully guarded in order to prevent the establishment of a precedent that will arise to vex and injure the Government.

I know that in my own State individuals acted under the provisions of an act of Congress which was approved October 5, 1918, entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of those ores, metals, and minerals which have formerly been largely imported or of which there is or may be an inadequate supply." Many persons in my State and in other States of the West, and in some of the Southern States spent thousands of dollars in trying to develop the rare metals which were indispensable in the conduct of the war. We needed manganese, pyrites, chrome, vanadium, and many other rare metals and minerals, and at great expense patriotic persons attempted their production. When the war suddenly came to an end, many of those individuals were found with incomplete plants, many were found with thousands and tens of thousands of tons of ores, some in process of being shipped, some upon the dumps, and some already shipped to eastern points. They presented claims to the Government and the Government held that there had been no valid contracts entered into and they could not be compensated; and they have not been compensated to this day.

Mr. President, there are hundreds of thousands of persons who sustained serious losses by reason of their patriotic efforts to increase production in manufactured products, in articles needed by our soldiers and by our allies, and in the production of metals and foodstuffs. They never have been compensated; they never will be compensated. If those who seek relief under this bill have valid contracts, not necessarily written contracts or express contracts, but contracts, express or implied, with the Government of the United States or accredited representatives of those boards or agencies of the United States upon whom was devolved the duty of building ships, then I insist that they shall be paid, and I shall be very glad to aid in setting up the necessary machinery in order that their claims may be presented, allowed, and paid. If we do not properly guard this bill the temptation will be great for the presentation of claims which are groundless and could not be sustained in law or in good conscience.

Mr. McNARY. Will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. By studying the bill it will appear to the Senator that it is based upon the proposition that there must be a contract, either express or implied, with the Government. The instance which the Senator cites of men who desire to come in under cover of the proposed legislation are instances where they have neither an implied nor a written contract, and, consequently, the bill would give them no relief; nor would it create any remedy to which they are entitled that we are now seeking to erect. On the first page of the bill it specifies clearly the contract to be had with the Government.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator consent to an amendment of the measure by which it shall be clearly expressed that no claim shall be paid that does not rest upon a valid contract, express or implied, with the Government of the United States or an accredited representative of the Government?

Let me add before the Senator answers that section 1 is ambiguous. It says claims are to be paid when "individuals, firms, or corporations * * * build * * * wooden ships for the United States," and so forth. Some persons may claim that they "built ships for the United States," but will fail to produce a contract. They may claim that some agent of the United States urged them to build ships, and that these efforts were solely the result of such alleged statements. The same situation exists with respect to many who produced cotton, or minerals, at a loss. There was no contract, but the persons so producing insist that they acted upon the request of the Government. There are doubtless cases where the desire for profit induced crop and metal production as well as shipyard and ship production. But I call attention to page 2 of the bill, which strikes out the words which would protect the Government.

Mr. McNARY. I will say to the Senator, in the first place, that I have not the bill in charge, and I can not authorize or accept the amendment. In the second place, by a careful reading the Senator will find a provision covering what the Senator now requests, and covering the very suggestion which he is proposing.

Mr. KING. The words which are stricken out by the committee are not quite broad enough. I should like to see them amended so as to more carefully guard and protect the interests of the Government. But let me say to my good friend from Oregon that I have no doubt a bill can be drawn and can be passed which will be just and fair in its terms to the Government and to those who have claims against the Government, and I shall be very glad to join the committee and the Senator from Oregon in passing a measure that will protect the Government and will deal justly with those who have claims against the United States.

I wish to call the attention of the Senator to one or two other provisions, so that he may have them in mind before the bill comes up again for consideration. I find on page 2, at the bottom of the page, these words are stricken out:

> And that no profits of any kind shall be included in the allowance of any of said claims, and that no investment for merely speculative purposes shall be recognized in any manner by said board.

I am not sure that the amendment offered by the committee fully protects the Government. I am inclined to think that it rather extends the opportunity for speculative and prospective profits. I direct the attention of the Senator and those having the bill in charge to that amendment.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FERNALD. At the top of page 3, line 3, there are these words:

> And provided further, That no prospective or possible profits of any kind shall be allowed on account of any ships or barges or other work contracted for—

Mr. KING. Will the Senator read the concluding words of the amendment?

Mr. FERNALD. They read as follows:

> Or other work contracted for on which no work has been done or commitments made.

Mr. KING. The Senator will see that there is a limitation. I think the Senator ought to strike those words out.

I direct attention to another amendment tendered by the committee, beginning in line 23, on page 3, and terminating in line 14, on page 4. That provision may be intelligible, and, doubtless, is to those who have drafted it, but I fancy that there are some loopholes under which the Government of the United States might be compelled to pay some unjust claims.

Mr. McNARY. Let me ask the Senator, does he refer to the amendment ending with the word "equitable," in line 13, on page 4—that is, the provision in italics?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. The whole thing?

Mr. KING. Yes; and I particularly direct the attention of the Senator to these words——

Mr. McNARY. I will state to the Senator that I think that was inserted largely on account of Judge Payne, the chairman of the Shipping Board, desiring to have a rule in the measure by which he could determine the amount and the quantity of the damage; and in order to relieve him from setting up a structure of his own he wanted a legislative guide by which he might act.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think this attempt to determine the basis of damage is objectionable. There is so much incertitude in the method of determining damages here that I think it needs clarification. For instance, where would these words carry us to? On page 4, after speaking of the deductions, the section proceeds:

> And the salvage value of said yards, plants, facilities, machinery, and equipment at the time of adjustment, less such amount as the contracts specify, shall be allowed for depreciation for each delivered ship hull and for each delivered barge.

I invite the attention of Senators to that.

Then I shall offer an amendment to this bill limiting the amount of the appropriation. The Senator from Maine says that it will not exceed ten or fifteen million dollars. I make the prediction now to my distinguished friend that claims will be lodged, if the bill is passed in the present form, that will go far beyond $15,000,000; and so I shall offer an amendment limiting the aggregate amount that may be paid under the bill.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, with the Senator's permission I will say that the chairman of the Shipping Board estimated that between ten and fifteen million dollars would be required; but the appropriation for that purpose is something like $55,000,000, so that this is less than 40 per cent of the amount that has already been appropriated.

Mr. KING. Well, if somebody has imposed upon Congress, and we have heretofore made an appropriation of $55,000,000 to liquidate valid claims which aggregate only ten or fifteen million dollars, there is no reason why we should not make a limitation upon the appropriation. Nobody had a right to come here and impose upon Congress and ask for an appropriation of $55,000,000 for claims that would not aggregate more than ten or fifteen million dollars.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator spoke a moment ago of a most laudable desire to have all those engaged in this work for the Government compensated for the amount of their actual damages.

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. Now he wants to impose a limitation, irrespective of whether or not they have suffered damages in a greater sum than that. I do not understand the Senator's position.

Mr. KING. The Senators say that the estimates which they have show damages of from ten to fifteen million dollars. Does the Senator mean to state that with this great cloud of employees which the Emergency Fleet Corporation and the Shipping Board have had, thousands of employees, and bureaus and boards and administrative officers without number, they do not know what contracts they have made or the actual, valid, bona fide claims against the Government? If they do not they are not fit to hold the offices which they now occupy.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NORRIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I call the Senator's attention to another fact—that since these estimates were made and submitted to the Appropriations Committee, and provided for in the appropriation bill, as to the amounts required to cover all of these claims, some $50,000,000, about 70 of the cases have been actually settled and adjusted on the original basis which the Shipping Board and Emergency Fleet Corporation felt they were authorized to settle. Now, a change in personnel of the chairmanship of the Shipping Board, resulting in Judge Payne's taking the place of Mr. Hurley, and other changes in the Emergency Fleet Corporation, have brought about a situation whereby Judge Payne felt that technically he might not have authority under existing law to settle these claims as the other claims had been settled, and on the basis that had been figured out and estimated before; and therefore he favors the granting by Congress of some authority like this. Some seventy-odd cases have been settled since that estimate went in, involving probably five million or six million dollars—at least that much and perhaps more—but the remaining cases have simply been suspended, waiting for some authority like this.

Furthermore, the Senator is in error when he speaks about going out to hunt up claims, and that sort of thing, to be presented under this bill. As a matter of fact, the claims involved in the provisions of this bill have been before the Shipping Board and Emergency Fleet Corporation for some eight months. Men have been about Washington and Philadelphia, endeavoring to reach settlements with these boards, for some 8 or 10 months. Now, it takes a good, long time to go through all of the accounts of each one of these yards. There are some 77 yards, as I recall, in the class of claims involved here; and to check up all these accounts and each one of these contractors' undertakings has taken a good deal of time. I am not complaining that too much time has been taken, perhaps; I am simply reminding the Senator that no new claims will be developed. The claims have all been in for some time, and the people have been trying to get an adjustment, and the delay has been occasioned by the time taken to arrive at the figures and go through all of the accounts and all the claims; and they have finally run up against the proposition that the Shipping Board felt that it did not have the authority to proceed further with these settlements.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have the pleasure of knowing Judge Payne. I only regret that Judge Payne was not chairman of the Shipping Board during its entire existence, and in making that observation I do not want to reflect upon those who preceded him; but I know that Judge Payne, if he administers this act, will deal fairly and justly with those who have valid claims against the Government, and I know that the interests of the United States will be absolutely protected and sacredly guarded. He is a man of the highest integrity and ability, and I think the Government is fortunate indeed in having him at the head of this organization at the present time. Nevertheless, Mr. President, I am in favor of a limitation on the appropriation.

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] says, "Suppose that the investigation demonstrates a larger amount due in the aggregate than the limitation contained in the bill, are they to be denied payment?" Why, of course not. If Judge Payne, or whoever has charge of this matter, shall, upon full and complete investigation, find that valid and legitimate claims exist against the Government in excess of the amount specified in the bill, Congress will immediately make an appropriation to cover them, and I do not believe now in leaving loopholes and opportunities for the payment of claims without any limitation whatever upon the appropriation.

Mr. President, I invite attention to section 2, which seems to be the product of the committee itself. I think the original bill, as offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], was much better than the bill as it came from the committee; but in lines 14, 15, and 16 on page 5 of the bill, I find these words:

And in making such adjustments due consideration shall be given to the conditions under which the contracts were entered into.

What does that mean? Conditions of poverty or of wealth, or the necessities of the individual, or the patriotic motives which inspired him, or the cupidity, if there was cupidity in his soul, which prompted him to engage in the undertaking? What conditions are referred to? Climatic conditions, financial conditions? I should like to know how any court, any tribunal, any jury, could properly interpret those words.

Not only are the conditions under which the contracts were entered into to be taken into account, but the conditions under which the work of construction was performed. What conditions are referred to? Climatic conditions, whether the person had to go a great distance to obtain the lumber and the timbers for the erection of the plant, and so on? I should like to know what those conditions are. There ought to be some limitation, something more specific, as a guide to those who shall administer the law. There can easily be conceived conditions which might be suggested to be considered by the board in determining the damages, if it is left to the whims, the caprice, the imagination, or even the judgment of rational and just men.

Then, at the bottom of page 5, I find these words—or any representative of either thereof, and such adjustments of claims of legal liability shall be made without regard to any claim submitted under section 1 hereof.

I do not know the purpose of that language. Is it to say, "You may go beyond the provisions of section 1; you may disregard it in submitting your claim"?

I have merely, in a very hasty and imperfect way, challenged attention to some of what appear to me to be defects in this measure. I am sure the Senate will consider it very carefully before giving it their approval.

AMERICANIZATION OF ALIENS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3315) to promote Americanization by providing for cooperation with the several States in the education of non-English-speaking persons and the assimilation of foreign-born residents, and for other purposes.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, the pending amendment, I understand, is the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING]. I am very much persuaded by his argument on the floor that there is great merit in his amendment. I have no authority to accept it for the committee; but it gets rid of any question of treaty violation, and there is danger that as the bill is now drawn there might be some violation of treaties. Furthermore, the argument of the Senator from South Dakota that the alien would say, "I am receiving exactly the same treatment as the citizen and not being compelled to do things that the citizen is not doing," tending toward a better feeling and perhaps more enthusiasm for our institutions, is likewise rather persuasive; and I enter no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 3, line 23, it is proposed to strike out subdivision (e), which reads as follows:

(e) Require, under penalty, all residents who are citizens of the United States, 16 years of age or over and under 21 years of age, and all residents of more than six months who are aliens, 16 years of age or over and under 45 years of age, who are illiterate or unable to understand, speak, read, or write the English language, to attend classes of instruction for not less than 200 hours per annum until they shall have completed a specified course approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

To which has been added an amendment by the committee, which reads as follows:

Provided, That this shall not apply to those who are in this country temporarily for sojourn or business.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following words:

(e) Require, under penalty, all resident persons, whether citizens of the United States or aliens, 16 years of age or over and under 21 years of age, who are not physically or mentally disqualified and who are illiterate or unable to understand, speak, read, or write the English language, to attend classes of instruction for not less than 200 hours per annum until they shall have completed a specified course prepared by the Department of Education or chief school officer of the State and approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "under penalty" in the first line of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has a right to modify his amendment in that respect.

Mr. STERLING. Very well. Now, Mr. President, I should like the proviso added by way of an amendment to the original subdivision (e) to be retained, and I accept the amendment of the committee as an amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota can modify his amendment in any way he chooses, and can add the proviso to his amendment if he desires.

Mr. KENYON. It will then stand as the substitute of the Senator from South Dakota, with the amendment of the committee as a part of his amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. How does it read now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated again as the Senator from South Dakota has modified it.

The READING CLERK. As modified, the amendment reads as follows:

(e) Require all resident persons, whether citizens of the United States or aliens, 16 years of age or over and under 21 years of age, who are not physically or mentally disqualified and who are illiterate or unable to understand, speak, read, or write the English language, to attend classes of instruction for not less than 200 hours per annum, until they shall have completed a specified course prepared by the Department of Education or chief school officer of the State and approved by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That this shall not apply to those who are in this country temporarily for sojourn or business.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Iowa whether it is his intention to raise the age limit on residents from 16 to 21, as now provided in the bill, to 16 to 45?

Mr. KENYON. No. As originally drawn and presented by the committee, citizens were required to receive this instruction from 16 to 21 and aliens up to 45. The question was raised that that would violate some of our treaty obligations, and, further, that it was unwise to have this difference in the treatment of aliens and citizens; so that under the substitute of the Senator from South Dakota they are treated exactly alike, 16 to 21. Then I understand that the Senator has another amendment to subdivision (f) which will provide for cooperation by the States in instruction in English up to 50; but that is entirely a matter to be arranged between the States and the Federal Government. There is nothing compulsory about that at all.

Mr. HARRISON. As I understand this amendment, it removes the compulsory provision altogether from 16 to 21. Is that right?

Mr. STERLING. No.

Mr. HARRISON. The word "penalty" was left out of the amendment.

Mr. STERLING. It is compulsory between the ages of 16 and 21. We struck out the words "under penalty," thinking those words rather harsh, probably; but under the provisions of the amendment the States must require this education for all persons between the ages of 16 and 21.

Mr. KENYON. It is left to the States as to how they shall do it.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand.

Mr. KENYON. They take care of any penalty question.

Mr. HARRISON. They may not impose a penalty or they may impose a penalty. Is that the idea?

Mr. KENYON. That is the idea.

Mr. HARRISON. And you do not propose to force compulsory education on aliens who are above 21?

Mr. STERLING. We do not; nor even provide for it in the next subdivision, as the Senator will know when I come to offer that subdivision.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I have listened to the discussion on this bill with a great deal of interest. I did not have the opportunity to give it the degree of consideration that I desired until the last two or three days, but I am convinced that it is a very bad bill, and I shall vote against it upon its final passage. I did not think that there was any doubt that the bill was violative of certain provisions of our treaties. The proponents of the legislation have now attempted to remedy that, so I shall not discuss that.

I am opposed to the bill for many reasons. In the first place it takes too much money and will get no good result. The bill will cost $85,000,000. Eighty-five million dollars is the amount provided for in the bill to educate foreigners in the United States or residents who may be illiterate—twelve and a half million dollars for three years by the Federal Government, twelve and a half million dollars by the States for three years, and $5,000,000 for the first year by the Federal Government and $5,000,000 by the States.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator that the bill has been changed by amendment? Five million dollars is entirely out of the bill for this year, and the balance of the appropriation is cut in two. The bill carries six and a half million dollars instead of twelve and a half million, and it would be only for the one year. The appropriation has to be made every year, but it undoubtedly will be made for the next two or three years.

Mr. HARRISON. The bill provides, then, so that we can appropriate forty-two and a half millions of dollars to educate resident illiterates and foreigners in this country.

Mr. KENYON. How does the Senator get the figures $42,500,000?

Mr. HARRISON. I am just cutting the amount $85,000,000 in half.

Mr. KENYON. The bill carries $6,500,000.

Mr. HARRISON. It carries $6,500,000 for three years on the part of the Federal Government, I understand.

Mr. KENYON. No; I want to be perfectly frank about it. It carries $6,500,000. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations takes the position that we can not appropriate for future years. Consequently that is cut out. It simply carries an appropriation for one year; but, of course, it will be law, and it will require appropriations, naturally, for the succeeding years.

Mr. HARRISON. You provide the law for the appropriation of $6,500,000 for three years, I understand.

Mr. KENYON. No; for one year. It only carries an appropriation for one year.

Mr. HARRISON. I did not know about the change.

Mr. KENYON. I think it is fair for the Senator to argue that it will be $6,500,000 a year for three years.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand that the bill carried $12,500,000 for three years on the part of the Federal Government, and a provision that each State must put up an equal amount. It would have carried $85,000,000 adding the $5,000,000 by the Federal Government and a like sum by the States to be appropriated for this year.

Mr. STERLING. Why does the Senator say that the bill carries $12,500,000 when an amendment has been adopted which reduced it to $6,500,000?

Mr. HARRISON. I said the bill did carry $12,500,000 per year on the part of the Federal Government, and to that a similar amount was to be added by the States for three years. I really did not know about the change. But, as stated by the Senator from Iowa, we can suppose that this is going to cost $6,500,000 for three years upon the part of the Government, and $6,500,000 for three years upon the part of the States. It would be around $35,000,000 we will say. Am I correct in that statement?

Mr. KENYON. I think that is a fair statement.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It, however, would be true that it would be entirely within the discretion of Congress, when the appropriation bill comes up, as to whether further appropriations are made.

Mr. KENYON. Yes; and it should be stated, too, that it is entirely within the discretion of the State as to whether it desires to appropriate a dollar.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, I understand that. I am just confining my remarks now to the provisions of the bill or the suggestions in regard to the amendment to it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Of course, if States do not desire to utilize this fund and do not make appropriations, to that extent the national appropriation would be reduced.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course. But the proponents of this legislation are very desirous that the States and the Federal Government, acting jointly, shall appropriate around $35,000,000 to educate the foreigners and the illiterate residents in this country for the next three years. Is that statement correct?

Mr. KENYON. The statement is correct. The bill does not go as far as I would go. I would leave the bill at $12,500,000, and if we can get rid of illiteracy in this country for $100,000,000 it would be the best money we ever spent. That is my position. I may be wrong, however.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand the Senator's position thoroughly. I am opposed to his position.

Mr. KENYON. That is all right. I am not objecting to that at all.

Mr. HARRISON. We can not agree on this proposition at all. I would not go at it in this way. I do not believe in taxing the old fellow who was not able to go to school in his younger years and who is a good, true American, who has fought in the armies of this country and helped to save the Union, perhaps, or fought for whatever he thought was right in the South during the war; I do not think that he should be now taxed in order to educate some foreigner who came to this country, who can not read or write the English language. I am opposed to that, while the Senator from Iowa is in favor of it. I believe there is a better way to get at it and to really Americanize the country.

Mr. KENYON. I do not think the old fellow is going to pay very much taxes.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand; but the Senator should not forget that he will pay his part, and there are a lot of them in this country—splendid, patriotic old fellows who are good, true Americans, but who, perhaps, can not read very well. I get letters occasionally from them. Senators who are within the sound of my voice get letters occasionally from them. They will explain sometimes, and apologize to the Senator to whom they are writing, that they are writing when really they do not know how to write very well; but I delight to get those letters; I believe there are just as true Americans in this country who can not read very well, and who can not write very well, and who can not speak the high-fangled English very well, as are found among the so-called educated class; and we should give some concern to those fellows.

What I would do is not to spend thirty-odd millions of dollars to educate these foreigners and these illiterate residents who may be 21 years of age, but I would appropriate every cent necessary to keep from this country the periodicals which are preaching I. W. W.ism, revolution, bolshevism, and other such isms. I would spend every cent necessary to enforce the immigration laws that we already have on the statute books, and I would pass an immigration law that for the next five years would prevent immigration absolutely to this country.

I know that there are very few Members of the Senate who agree with me in my views touching that question. I think we ought to tighten up the reins against foreigners coming into this country for the next five years, because they are going to flood the country, they are going to try to hunt out loopholes in the present immigration law. They will be in many cases an undesirable lot.

There is no politics in this measure, so far as I am concerned. I am so strong for a strict enforcement of the immigration law, and a strong immigration law, that twice I have voted to override the veto of the President of the United States in passing appropriate immigration legislation. I voted to override the veto of the President when we had a Republican President and I voted to override the veto of the President when we had a Democratic President, and I would be glad to-day to vote for an immigration law that would prevent such people as you desire to provide for in this bill from coming into this country for the next five years.

I would be glad to vote for a reasonable appropriation to stop the publication in this country of any periodical, or allow it to be sent through the mails, that was not printed in the English language. I would be glad to appropriate more money for the enforcement of the laws against the people whom my friend from Iowa so beautifully pictured the other day, who go into the little camps called "Little Austria" or "Little Germany" or "Little Hungary" and preach to them in their language these un-American doctrines. I think those people ought to be stopped, punished, and sent away from our land. Every cent that is necessary to accomplish it should be provided.

Not long ago the Commissioner of Immigration, Mr. Caminetti, came before the Immigration Committee of the Senate and appealed for some legislation so that the Bureau of Immigration could employ more men to enforce the present immigration law. We ought to give it to them, and yet we have failed. That is the way you are going to Americanize this country. You are not going to do it by spending $35,000,000 in trying to teach some man who is 21 years of age how to read and write the English language. Learning how to read and write does not always make one a better American. Some of the most dangerous scoundrels to American institutions in America to-day are highly educated.

The amendment that is suggested by the Senator from South Dakota provides that you shall not make compulsory this law on those above 21 years of age. While I am against the whole bill, it looks to me, if you are going to make it compulsory on those under 21 years of age, why do you not apply it to those above 21 years of age? Why place any limitation to the proposition, if you are going to put compulsory education in this bill? There are probably as many foreigners in this country who are preaching these false doctrines and carrying on this propaganda who are over the age of 45 as under the age of 45, and certainly more over 21 years of age than under 21 years.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator know how many illiterate foreigners there are in the United States over 21 and under 45 years of age?

Mr. HARRISON. That has not been stated, but I am taking it for granted that there are approximately about as many, perhaps, as there are under 21.

Mr. SMOOT. Does not the Senator think there are more between the ages of 21 and 45 than there are under 21?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I think decidedly so; and I think if you are going to have compulsory education below 21, if you think some good results are coming from it, you ought to apply it to those above 21, and you should not have the limitation at 45, because the man who is attempting to carry on that kind of a propaganda, if he is over 45, can do just as much harm as the man under 45 years of age.

So far as the resident illiterates are concerned, I want to make this suggestion to the Senator from Iowa. If he really desires to Americanize the resident illiterates in this country, let me suggest to the Senator that if, in the Senator's State and in every other State of the Union the legislatures would put an educational clause in the constitution so that a man could not vote unless he could read and write and understand the English language, it would seem to me that the result would be much better than we will get by spending $35,000,000 in teaching some people in their old age how to read and write the English language.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Make it the qualification to read and write the English language.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; make it the qualification, as suggested by my colleague, to read and write the English language.

In my own State and in all the Southern States they appropriate liberally to educate all our illiterates. Some of them go to school; some fail or refuse to go to school. We do not have compulsory education. It does not seem to me that it is just, fair, or wise to have compulsory education for the illiterate person over school age in my section or in any other section, and compel him to go to school 200 hours a year just at the age perhaps when he can labor and should make a living for himself or family, and not compel the schoolboy at school age to go to school. I am against compulsory education under all circumstances, but the position here taken is inconsistent and unwise.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, of course, the Senator will understand that the hope is that before they are 16 they will have learned to read and write. If so, they will not be compelled to go after they are 16.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The idea of making it necessary to require them to go to school at that age is that if they pass out of the ordinary school age they will pass on to be 21 as illiterates.

Mr. HARRISON. But the Senator is aware that in his State there is a very small per cent of illiterate population who go to school between the ages of 7 and 16, although his State provides the medium and the means by which they can go to school. They have no compulsory education law in his State, but by this bill, if they failed to go to school when they were younger, you take them out of the field, take them out of the sawmill, take them out of the various lines of work when they grow older, and compel them to go to school. I do not know what kind of penalty is to be imposed. They have stricken out the word "penalty." You leave that for the States to say. Some States may provide a death penalty for the offense.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I would like to ask my colleague one question divided into three parts. Does he remember the age at which Andrew Jackson quit school?

Mr. HARRISON. I know it was quite a young age.

Mr. OVERMAN. Thirteen years.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does my colleague remember the age at which Henry Clay quit school?

Mr. HARRISON. He was quite young.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does my colleague remember the age at which Daniel Webster quit school?

Mr. HARRISON. My recollection is that he was quite young.

Mr. WILLIAMS. These were all three tolerably well distinguished American citizens, as I remember. Does my colleague think that by forcing a negro in Mississippi to go to school at 21 you can make him the equal of any one of the three?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not. It would be a beautiful sight down there to get all these negroes who are illiterate up to the age of 45 years and herd them together and drive them under a State law to school. It is all wrong, in my opinion. The bill ought not to pass. We ought to pass more stringent immigration laws. We ought to spend in some other way the $35,000,000 that is proposed to be expended in the bill. It seems to me it would be much more in the interest of this country if we would economize in this bill and make reasonable appropriations in other directions, especially at this time, when the steering committee of the Republican Party is trying to preach economy along certain lines.

I read in the paper this morning that at the other end of the Capitol, in order to economize, to be able to tell the people that they had saved a lot of money, the steering committee of the Republican Party had lopped off $30,000,000 from the rivers and harbors bill; that they had reduced it from $42,000,000 to twelve and a half million dollars for this year. That is false economy, saving $30,000,000 from the rivers and harbors, when the board of Army engineers had recommended it, when they had put their approval on it. Now you desire to take that money and educate foreigners in this country to read and write the English language, and compel some illiterates in certain sections of the country to go to school after they have passed school age.

We appropriated during the war millions of dollars to build a merchant marine. We have to-day a merchant marine that is the pride of America. It helped us to win the war. Great encouragement was given to shipbuilding, and yet, although you can not utilize ships unless you have harbors, unless the harbors are maintained and improved, as the lanes in which the ships must come and go; although you can not have an export trade and take our proper place among the nations of the world unless you have ships and harbors in which they can come, this economy program lopped off $30,000,000 from the rivers and harbors, and proposes to appropriate it, perhaps, or make it possible to appropriate it, for the education of foreigners in this country. It is false economy; it is all wrong; and if you insist upon it, it will rise to plague you.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to say merely a word with reference to the amendment. I really did not intend to say anything, but it seems to me that the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota would really limit the object of the bill, and I think in a way it would be very harmful, indeed, if much good is to come from the bill at all. I have not any doubt that there are three or four times the number of illiterate foreigners in the United States between the ages of 21 and 45——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I note that there are only four Senators upon the Republican side and only seven Senators upon the Democratic side. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is making, with his usual intelligence and his usual industry, a speech that ought to be listened to by somebody. I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I make the point of order that no business has been transacted since the last call for a quorum. There will not be as many Senators here if a quorum is called as there are now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that there has been no business transacted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am inclined to think the point of order made by the Senator from Iowa is well taken. I have no idea of encumbering the public business. My purpose in calling attention to the fact that the Senate has merely ceased to function has been accomplished.

Mr. KENYON. How much of the time has the Senator from Mississippi been in the Chamber this afternoon?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Mississippi is in now, at any rate.

Mr. KENYON. Yes; but that is about all. The Senator comes in, makes a call for a quorum, and then will walk out.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator from Utah will yield to me, the point is not whether the Senator from Mississippi is present here; the point is not whether the Senator from Iowa is present or not at some previous period; but the point I am making is that here is a very distinguished Senator from a very important State making some very important statements, and there is nobody here to listen to him. Of course, the Senator from Iowa is present during the consideration of this bill because he is in charge of it upon the floor, but he has not been in the Senate all the time.

Mr. KENYON. I am present during the consideration of every bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Mississippi has not been present all of the time when it was being considered, but I want to call the attention of the country to the fact that there are twice as many Senators as there are States, and here is a very important argument, weighted down with good reasons, apparently directed to the Senate, and after that directed to the country, and that there are 11 Senators present to hear it. Again and again Senator after Senator has risen charging that some executive branch of the Government did not function. I thought I would call the attention of the country and of the galleries, because so many Senators speak to the galleries, to the fact that the Senate itself is not functioning very well.

It is not a question whether it is my fault or the fault of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], or the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], or the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], or the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], or the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], or the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]. I am not bringing in any individual charge. I am merely asserting that the Senate is not functioning.

Mr. KENYON. Why does not the Senator scold the Senators who are not here instead of scolding those who are here?

Mr. WILLIAMS. How can I scold Senators when they are not here?

Mr. KENYON. The Senator has great capacity for scolding.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will appoint me a committee of one, I shall be glad to——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator ought, at least, to have stated——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah has the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from Mississippi at least ought to have stated that those whose names he mentioned were here; and there are other Senators here also.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think it is quite uncalled for, and particularly for the Senator from Mississippi to call attention to the absence of Senators as he did at the close of a long day's session; and if it is repeated in the same way many times there will be some very plain statements pass between Senators in this Chamber.

When I was interrupted I was calling the attention of the Senate to the fact that there are at least three and, perhaps, four times as many illiterate foreigners in the United States between the ages of 21 and 45 as there are between the ages of 16 and 21. I would very much prefer, if there is a question of treaty right involved in the original paragraph to which the Senator from South Dakota offers the amendment, to amend it by raising the ages of 16 years and over and under 21 to the ages of 16 years and over and under 45, so that both classes would fall within the same age limit and there would be no question of the violation of treaties. I think that if our country is in danger from illiterate aliens, men over 21 years of age will be the chief offenders.

The men who are over 21 and under 45 years of age are the active men found among the illiterates of foreign born in this country. They will be the ones who will be the leaders and exercise influence wherever they go among their associates. It will not be the boys of 16 or 17 or 18 or 21; it will be the men of 25 and 40 or 45 who are influential for good or evil.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. While I agree that the Senator is stating the facts correctly in regard to the particular persons about whom he is speaking, it is true that the bill covers two classes of people. The class that the Senator is speaking about, who are over 21 and who have this influence, are people who can not speak or write the English language, as a rule. Is not that true?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. The bill provides for the education of illiterates, regardless of whether they can speak the English language, and it also includes foreigners who can not. Would it not reach the remedy if we confine the activities of the Government, as far as the class the Senator is speaking of, to the teaching of the English language to those who could not speak it?

Mr. SMOOT. I think that would go a long way to remedy the defect, as the Senator suggests.

Mr. NORRIS. I can not discuss the proposed amendment properly, because it has not been printed. It is an amendment that is a substitute for subdivision (c), and I can not discuss it intelligently, because I do not have it before me; but it seems to me that the difficulty comes from the fact that we are insisting upon educating people, regardless of whether they can speak English, who are over 21 years of age. An education, as far as any compulsion is concerned at least, ought to be confined to younger people, commencing with 7 years of age and, perhaps, ending with 16 or 18 years of age.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota, in the first place, proposes to strike out the words, on page 3, line 23, "under penalty."

Mr. NORRIS. But it still uses the word "require," so that the law that the State must pass must require that this be done. I can not conceive how it could require it to be done unless it did attach some penalty, otherwise it would not be a requirement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator from Utah will permit me for just a moment, in immediate connection with what the Senator from Nebraska has just stated, I will propound this inquiry to the Senator from Utah: If we once take the position that the United States Government has the right to require a State to put into operation certain educational facilities, I should like to know where the United States Government shall stand in its controversy with Japan about the treaty rights of the Japanese children to attend white schools in California? Or where it would stand if the British Empire made an equal demand in consequence of the same clause in a treaty with it, which is a favored-nation clause as well as an original-treaty clause, requiring the equal treatment of their subjects here? That might lead to the fact that there might be a demand upon the part of the British Empire for admitting negro children from the West Indies, Jamaica, and other places, to the white schools in Mississippi; and there might be a demand from the French Republic upon the same grounds.

When we had to meet the Japanese demand we put it upon the ground that that was not a concern of the Federal Government, and that, as far as the Federal Government was concerned, it was powerless to regulate it. If you are contrary to the Constitution, and assert that the Federal Government has the power, how are you going to meet these international questions?

Mr. SMOOT. That question has appealed to me, I will say, and I have tried to reconcile this proposed legislation with the position taken by the Government at the time the question arose as to the Japanese children in the State of California entering the public schools; but that question is not involved in the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota and under discussion.

Mr. NORRIS. If I may interrupt the Senator, I should like to call attention to the fact that it is unnecessary to take the time of all the Members to answer that question, because the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has already left the Chamber.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; the Senator from Mississippi remained in the Chamber long enough to ask the question.

I am going to read the amendment which was offered by the Senator from South Dakota, as the Senator from Nebraska has said he does not have it before him.

Paragraph (e) of section 5 would read as follows, according to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota:

> Requiring all resident persons, whether citizens of the United States or aliens, 16 years of age or over and under 21 years of age, who are not physically or mentally disqualified, and who are illiterate or unable to understand, speak, read, or write the English language, to attend classes of instruction for not less than 200 hours per annum until they shall have completed a specified course prepared by the Department of Education or chief school officer of the State and approved by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That this shall not apply to those who are in this country temporarily for sojourn or business.

The Senator will notice that that part of the original paragraph (e) stricken out begins on page 4, after the word "alien":

> Sixteen years of age or over and under 45 years of age who are illiterate.

Those words are stricken out so as to make the ages of both classes of illiterates the same. What I endeavored to bring to the attention of the Senate was that I believed that the proposed amendment is a mistake. I very much prefer to have the first part of the amendment apply to aliens 16 years and over and under 45. With that change I can not see how any question could arise as to the matter of rights of aliens in this country under any treaty entered into by this country with the country from which the alien came.

I suppose the reason for not extending this to those who are 45 years of age and making it compulsory for them to attend the schools provided for is that generally they would be married men; they would have families, and it would be exceedingly difficult to compel them to attend school. But I am quite sure that if good is to follow the passage of this legislation it would be necessary to educate the men between 21 and 45 years of age to speak English and learn of American ideals. Whether that can be done under the bill or not I am not sure; but, so far as I am concerned, I would very much prefer the original text without the amendment. If the amendment is defeated, then I shall ask that the age be increased to 45 in the first-named class.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I stepped out of the Chamber a moment ago to the cloakroom to take a whiff at a cigar, in order to relieve my soul from the constant argumentations, and I understand that during my absence the Senator from Utah stated there was no use to answer me, because I had just left.

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator need not have answered me. My argument was left in the Senate, and he might have answered that.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Mississippi is mistaken. The Senator from Utah did not make the statement attributed to him; but I am perfectly willing that the Senator should charge the Senator from Utah with anything he sees fit to. I desire to say to the Senator from Mississippi——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wanted the Senator from Utah to understand that the observations I made did not necessarily require my physical presence. I asked the Senator a question, and I understand that as I stepped out he stated that he need not answer the question because I was not here; but the question remained here.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator has been misinformed as to the statement he says I made.

Mr. HARRISON. It was stated on the floor of the Senate that the Senator from Mississippi had left the Chamber.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg the Senator's pardon. I was misinformed by another Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. It would not have made any difference if the Senator from Utah had said it, as far as that is concerned, but I will simply say to the Senator from Mississippi that he is mistaken.

If the Senate wants to adopt the amendment, well and good; but I think it will make the bill weaker by far than the original text.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the question to which I wished to direct the attention of the Senator and of the Senate was this: If the United States Government undertakes to "require" of a State that it shall do certain things with regard to the education of its children, then the United States Government has surrendered the contention that education within a State, schools within a State, and educational facilities within a State are a part of the State jurisdiction and do not belong to the Federal Government, and therefore that the Federal Government can not remain answerable to foreign governments on that account, under terms of treaties promising nondiscrimination.

It is well known that in the California-Japanese issue the answer of the United States was, "This is a dual form of government. All the world must take notice of it. This Federal Government can not control the administration of schools within a State."

By the way, that was nothing new. Thomas Jefferson, Secretary of State under George Washington, first gave that notice to the world in connection with the debts that Virginians and other colonists owed to British merchants, and said that all the Federal Government could do was to promise to use its best efforts to "persuade the States" to pass the laws necessary to make their citizens pay their debts to British merchants; and later on it was all settled, under the Jay treaty, I believe, or under some treaty—I am forgetful about that; but the United States Government paid the money out of its Treasury under protest, so to speak, saying that while it was not a matter of Federal jurisdiction, the Federal Government had rendered itself to a certain extent morally responsible, and that, therefore, under the Jay treaty in the settlement of various claims the United States Government would become responsible for a certain number of dollars due from American citizens to British merchants. Then the British withdrew their forces from the northwestern ports, and we and they signed and ratified the treaty.

This is more than a mere matter of congressional legislation. It is a question of world relationship. Either this Federal Government has a right, or it has not a right, to compel equal treatment of those who have migrated to the United States under our immigration laws from foreign governments in the schools of the States composing our United States. Our contention hitherto has been that the Federal Government had no authority under the Constitution to do it. The minute you say that Congress has the right to "require" a State to do anything about the education of the residents of the State, whether native born in the State or emigrants out of other States or immigrants from foreign countries, you have surrendered that contention. I repeat what I have said before, that if that be true, and if the Federal Government has a right to make a requirement upon the States, then there is no justification at all for the action of the State of California in connection with the deprivation of Japanese immigrants from certain educational facilities, because the minute you make the distinction that the California Legislature made, you have made a discrimination contrary to the treaty, as against the Japanese child, in favor of the American child.

I say that California had a right to make that discrimination, and I say that the Federal Government has no right, treaty or no treaty, to interfere with California in separating white and Japanese children in schools, nor with Mississippi if she puts negro children from the British West Indies and French West Indies in separate schools from white children, whether they are born in Mississippi or elsewhere. I say the only ground upon which you can defend our traditional contention is that the Federal Government had no constitutional power to enforce mixed schools. You can not defend it upon the ground that the Federal Government had no will to do it; you can not defend it upon the ground that it had no wish to do it; you can not defend it upon the ground that it wanted to make the discrimination as a Government, internationally speaking, because it had no right to make any discrimination, having promised by treaty that it would not. From the beginning of this Government down to now, beginning with Tom Jefferson as Secretary of State under George Washington, we have promulgated to the world this idea, expressed in one of Mr. Jefferson's earliest letters as Secretary of State—that the world must take notice of the fact that this is a dual Government, and that the Federal Government of the United States is a Government of delegated powers, and that it has no rights in the States except in so far as it has received a constitutional delegation of power. That dates from the first American administration under the Constitution; and the minute you dig up by the roots that plant of American thought you have entirely destroyed the character of our Government. The minute you say that any foreign government has a right to call the Federal Government to account for any exercise of an undelegated power that remained reserved in the States, you have destroyed the character of your own national tree, of your own peculiar dual form of government.

I am glad to see that the Senator from Utah, by nodding his head, agrees with me about that.

Mr. President, that is the main thing at the bottom of this. I deny the right of the Federal Government to "require" Mississippi or to bribe Mississippi by offering or withholding help to do anything with regard to the education of her children or the children within her boundaries of school age, and I deny it upon the general principle that this is a government of delegated powers—as unpopular as that doctrine may be right now—and that the Federal Government has no right under the sun except such right as is delegated to it by the States, either under the original Constitution or under the amendments later adopted.

Another thing: You in this bill talk to me about compelling a man to study English! Leaving aside the power and the right of the Federal Government, suppose it were a State question alone: I say that to require any man who is 21 years of age, and the captain of his own soul, and the master of his own destiny, to study any language is tyranny. I say that, Mr. President, in full possession of the idea, which is a fact, that no human being upon the surface of this earth can be in full sympathy with American institutions, American traditions, and American ideals unless he can read and write and think English, because our institutions come from England. They come from the Magna Charta. They come from the Bill of Rights and the Petition of Rights. They come from the Act of Settlement. They come from Charles II. They come all the way down, not as a sudden thing all at once adopted in America by a Constitutional Convention, but as the growth and development and final eighteenth century best matured thought of America as a part of the mother country in its birth and raising—constituting up to the date of our independence a part of its law, constituting a part of its traditions, constituting a part of its old religion, and constituting a part of its then daily habit of thought.

These men, English born, or American born of English and Scotch and Welsh and Irish parents, met in Philadelphia. They struck out no sudden, great, new principle. They merely communicated to the world the finished political and civil-rights product of English-speaking civilization, and they were themselves the finished individual products of English-speaking civilization—George Washington, English all over, a Virginia planter, at the head of it; Witherspoon, Scotch in thought and prejudice, from Princeton; Hamilton, the son of a Scottish woman, from the West Indies originally; Jefferson, of Welsh parentage; Madison, of English parentage; all the balance of them Americans, yes, but Americans as the finished product of British development and growth in law, in literature, in language, in commerce, and in everything else that goes to the making of a people homogeneous then—nobody from southeastern Europe at that time to teach Bolshevism and anarchy; English-speaking, though some of them were from Ireland, but still even they spoke English and had spoken it so long that Irish had become with them a dead language. They read Dean Swift, and they read William Shakespeare, and they read John Milton, and they read Blackstone, and they read Sir Matthew Hale, and they read the Magna Charta, and they read the Bill of Rights, and all that was a part of their very thought and their very soul. There was nothing else in them—Hollanders, Welshmen, Irishmen, Englishmen, Scotchmen, but all of the same literature, all of the same traditions, all of the same law, and all virtually of the same religion. I do not mean as far as sects go. They had various sects, but the old English-speaking religion meant only this—that every man is individually responsible to God for his own worship and for his own opinion, and that is to-day the religion of the English-speaking race, whether the particular man be a Roman Catholic or a Presbyterian or an Episcopalian or a Campbellite or a Seventh Day Adventist. It comes to the point that a man is responsible alone and solely, and not through the instrumentality of any government or any synod or any priesthood, for his relationship to God—to God himself, to God alone.

Now, Mr. President, one more word.

The very keystone of the arch of the maintenance of the structure of English-speaking civilization has consisted in the localization of education and in the fact that education was not centralized nor uniform. The very glory of the old log schoolhouse and "the old field schoolhouse" consisted in the fact that it encouraged originality and independent thought, and hardly four schools taught the same books. Yankee thought has been great in this country; Dixie thought has been great in this country; Middle States thought, Pacific thought, Utah thought, Arizona thought, New Mexican thought, and the very difference between the civilization and the glory of the English-speaking race and the so-called civilization and so-called glory of the Germanic Empire has consisted in the fact that education was left to seek independent lines of development in America and England and Scotland and Wales and Ireland and New Zealand and South Africa and Australia and Canada, whereas little by little the Government Prussianized education in Germany, and when it Prussianized it it stereotyped it, and it stereotyped it by uniformizing it, if I may construct an English word that can not be found in the dictionary.

I hate uniformity. I hate it in the church; I hate it in the State; I hate it in the school. I do not want any Mormon teaching my children according to Mormon ideas; I do not want any Roman Catholic teaching them according to the ideas of the Pope, and I would not for my hand have my church teach the Mormon children or the Roman Catholic children according to my church's ideas, either. The greatest thing that God has given any human being is liberty, freedom, the right to think for himself, and the only great danger to that God-given right of intellectual development is uniformizing it, centralizing it, stereotyping it, making a State function of it.

I like to read Edgar Allan Poe. A New Englander loves to read Whittier. Each of us loves to read the other's poet, too, but not to the same degree. A Scotchman loves to read Burns. An Irishman loves to read Tom Moore, and he loves to read Charles O'Malley, and the Scotchman loves to read Sir Walter Scott, and the genuine Englishman loves to read Charles Dickens or Thackeray, and the genuine southern English-speaking man loves to read Thomas Nelson Page and Uncle Remus, and the genuine Yankee loves to read a novel by Henry James.

Let them all alone, and do not uniform their schools, nor attempt thereby to stereotype their thoughts. Do not make my children read in Mississippi what a Massachusetts child is reading in Massachusetts, nor do I ask that your children be made to read Annabel Lee, though I hope they will. Do not make them all learn the same things out of the same books, and then come together when they are grown people all molded in a common mold, with no clash of thought and no clash of soul and no clash of sentiment, and therefore no individuality nor liberty. Give them a chance.

The only uniformity that is worth a thing in this world is a uniformity growing out of diversity, because the uniformity which grows out of diversity is the survival of the fittest for the mature mind; but do not start the child off with somebody's idea of what ought to be the survival of the fittest in American thought. Give them a chance to grow up. Do not stereotype them until after they are grown, anyhow. Federal centralization and the centralization of industry, and all of the balance of it, do enough to centralize men after they are grown; but, for God's sake, leave the child free, ununiformed, uncentralized, ungovernmentally captured, unstereotyped. Let him think according to his environment. Then let the several environments clash out what is highest. Give him at least what God has given him, what God gives us all. He gives us the right to go wrong if we want to. Going wrong is not always a bad thing. The experience and remorse of it may make you go right; perhaps even, in the main, stay right.

If God can afford to leave man free, the Federal Government ought to afford to leave him free—free for Mormonism if he wants it, free for Roman Catholicism if he wants it, free for the predestination of the Presbyterian Church if he wants that, free for a belief in the Seventh Day Adventists if he wants that, free for any measure of thought in the world except when it crosses the line of becoming a personal injury to a fellow citizen. That is the only line of forbidden progress.

Mr. President, at first I was in favor of this bill, because I am in favor of Americanism, and, as I said a moment ago, no human being can be a good American citizen who can not read English, speak English, and, moreover, think English. You say that if I admit that I have given up the whole contention. I have not, because there is something higher even than that, and that is the freedom that God left to a man; and if we stand around and quarrel with Russia and Austria and Prussia because they made Poles study German or Russian, we have no right to make these people learn English.

But you ask, "How are you going to prevent the poison, then, from entering the American body politic?" My answer is simply do as Mississippi has done. Do not let any man vote until and unless he can read and write English. That divorces him from the body politic. Then, if you want to go a little further, provide a penalty against any man, directly or indirectly, interfering with American politics who is not a voter.

I might go to that latter position with you. I am not quite ready to commit myself to it; but I am perfectly ready to commit myself to the first proposition, that no man should become a member of the body politic of America, not even to the extent of a little nail upon his little finger, unless he can read and write English. If he can read and write English, we can take it for granted that perhaps he can think English, and that perhaps he has accumulated behind him the traditions and has in front of him the ideals of the English-speaking race. But leave the Federal Government out of it. Let us have precious diversity—e pluribus unum; but let the unum be by competitive evolutionary process.

One more thought, Mr. President, and I will take my seat—or I may perhaps retire to the cloakroom, unless some Senator wants to comment on it or take advantage of it. The war is over—not technically, not theoretically, and not internationally—but the cessation of hostilities has come about. Let us get back as soon as we can to the normal condition of thought, life, and government of the English-speaking race, with the utmost freedom possible consistent with the safety of the State, and let us repeal as rapidly as we can all the mere emergency laws, and let us not resort to any more emergency laws. Let us get back to George Washington and to Thomas Jefferson and to the Constitution of the United States.

Here you stand in the Senate, having refused to have anything to do with your brethren in the balance of the world. You have declined all burdens and all responsibilities of an international character, and yet here the other day the Senate passed a resolution in the utmost insolence telling what America wants about Thrace. There are various resolutions pending to tell what America wants done about various other European countries. After you said, "We hereby divorce ourselves from this entire business and will have nothing to do with it; we decline the burdens and we decline the responsibilities," let us not insolently proclaim our right to put our fingers in the pie whenever we please. If we are not one of our European brother's keepers—though I think under God we ought to be—then do not order him around.

Mr. President, one of two things we have to take up internationally, and that is either our part of the burden and our part of the responsibilities of civilization and peace keeping, or else, if we isolate ourselves and divorce ourselves from civilization and the cause of peace, we ought to do it completely. One of the two things is logical. Both of them are unthinkable; that is, at the same time.

As for this Federal Government, speaking for myself and my people, we will die for it in the exercise of its legitimate functions; we will follow its flag to the uttermost parts of the world in assertion of its legitimate rights, but we do ask that outside of that it keep its miserable hands off of our shoulders and its miserable fingers out of our pockets.

Die for it? Yes. Live for it? Yes. Stultify ourselves for it? No. Confess that this is no longer a Government of delegated powers? No. Confess that the Federal Government has a right to require a State to do anything with regard to its roads or its ferries or its educational facilities? No. Confess that we have no right to resist it in the exercise of its legitimate functions? Yes. Make somebody, because he is a foreigner, study English? No.

What is the necessity of it? There is just one thing you have to do, and the State can do it, the Federal Government need not do it. Open the public and night schools, give opportunity for education to everybody, and then let each State pass a law that where a child's parents want to have their child excused from attendance at a public school they must prove that the private school which will take the place of the public school will teach English.

As to compulsory English teaching at the public schools, that is utterly useless, because every lesson—reading, writing, arithmetic, geography, algebra, and everything—is taught in English, and the child can not learn it without learning English. So there is an indirect compulsory education in English by the State law and custom as far as the public school is concerned.

When a German Lutheran in Iowa or a Roman Catholic in New York insists that his child shall be released from attendance on the public school, tell him, "All right; we will give you that license, provided you will furnish us with a certificate which will meet with our credence that English will be taught in the school to which you are going to send your child. That is all that is necessary. Otherwise, you can send him to the parish school; you can do what you please with him. He is yours until he is grown, but while he is yours he is the State's, too, and the State has the right to say that he shall be educated, and while you may have a right to say he shall not be educated in the public schools, a State has a right to say that in your substitute school the language of the United States shall be taught, so that the child can understand the laws and the thought of the United States."

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I offered the pending amendment with the very best of intentions, and with the idea that in doing so I was helping to Americanize, as far as possible, this Americanization bill.

There are three reasons for the substitute to subdivision (e) of the bill. The first is that compulsory education of persons over 21 years of age is contrary to the spirit and the genius of our institutions. Whether citizens or whether aliens, I do not believe we should provide for the compulsory education of persons over 21 years of age. That is one reason for offering the substitute.

The original subdivision (e) provided for compulsory education of aliens over the age of 21 years and up until the age of 45 years. That did not appeal to me. It seemed to me that we were going further than we should attempt to go in imposing compulsory education upon people after they had reached their majority. No State in the Union which has compulsory education, I think, has gone beyond the age of 16 years in compulsory education; perhaps from 7 to 14 or from 8 to 16. My own State of South Dakota in 1907 enacted a compulsory-education law, the minimum age being 8 and the maximum being 16.

I do not know how many States in the Union have a compulsory-education law, but a great many indeed. So in the mere fact of compulsory education there should be nothing objectionable.

Why do we begin in the bill and under subdivision (e) at the age of 16? We give them the opportunity for education prior to that time, voluntary education; but if, on arriving at the age of 16 years, the young man or the young woman can not read, write, or speak the English language, then it should be made compulsory, and that whether for alien or for citizen of the United States.

So, Mr. President, it is in accordance, as I said, with our traditions and with the spirit of our institutions that I provide by this substitute that the maximum age for compulsory education shall be 21 years.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Have we not, however, neglected in our system of education any special consideration of the foreign-speaking people who are coming in and increasing in our country, and may we not feel that the peculiarity of the trouble sought to be reached by the bill, to teach English even to the mature, will be accepted by the States as a justification for extending the age beyond the usual age and seeking to take hold of all who are living with us and requiring that they should learn and speak English?

Mr. STERLING. I had intended to mention that matter a little later, but I might as well do it now.

A second reason for my amendment to the bill is the discrimination for which the bill provides between aliens and residents. It is my fear, Mr. President, that that discrimination in and of itself would injure the very cause we are trying to promote by this bill, and the alien element would say, "Why are we discriminated against? Why are we obliged to attend school here after we have reached the age of 21 years and up until 45 years of age when your illiterate American citizen over 21 is not required to attend school at all?"

I think, Mr. President, that in and of itself is a fatal objection to the provision.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Would it trouble the Senator for me to make a statement just here?

Mr. STERLING. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I would be glad to see the word "alien" stricken out of the bill, and I would be very much gratified to see all between 21 and 45 in the United States who can not speak English required by the States to give 200 hours a year to learning how to speak English until each can speak English.

Mr. STERLING. The first objection I make is that that course would be contrary to the spirit of our institutions and our traditions. Moreover, I fear it would be very difficult to enforce such a law. I mention another objection: When a man has reached the age of 21 years, or soon after, or about that time, he becomes the head of a family, he is a breadwinner, and his circumstances may be such that it would be a great hardship imposed upon him to require him to give 200 hours a year for the purpose of education. We will no doubt find many so situated the country over.

So there are the three reasons, then, for my substitute to subdivision (e): First, because compulsory education from 21 to 45 years of age is contrary to the genius of our institutions.

Second, because of the discrimination between the alien element and the citizens of the United States, which I fear will be resented.

Third, because after a man has reached the age of 21 years he is often so situated and circumstanced in regard to means and the support of his family that he will not be able to attend school; hence for such a man this is a requirement we should not impose.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I wanted to ask the Senator if he knows of any State in the Union that has not compulsory education?

Mr. STERLING. I do not know of any, but I think there are some.

Mr. SMOOT. I mean between the ages of 7 or 8 up to 16 or 18?

Mr. STERLING. No.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not looked it up, but there must be very few such States. The children of aliens, no matter where they are located, are compelled to go to school in the State in which they are located. It seems to me that if we are going to get at illiteracy, as far as the alien is concerned, we have to reach him after he is 21 years of age in some way.

I have a great deal of sympathy with the statement the Senator from South Dakota has just made in relation to a man after he reaches 21 years of age being compelled to go to school, even for the purpose of learning to speak the English language, but it is the great object of the bill to accomplish that purpose. I think below 16 years of age our school systems in the different States will take care of it now. I think if the Senator will look up the statistics he will find that the great percentage of the immigrants coming into the country who remain illiterate are men and women who immigrate here when over the age of 21 years. If we are not going to touch them and can not reach them in any way, I think then that a great many of the advantages, if there is any advantage to the bill at all, would be lost.

Mr. STERLING. I will answer the Senator; I think I can. Short of making education compulsory after the person has reached the age of 21 years, the bill provides and the second substitute which I have to offer when the pending one is disposed of provides as follows: That each State that accepts the benefits of the act shall—

Provide, as far as possible, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, for the education of resident persons, whether citizens of the United States or aliens, of the age of 21 years or more and less than 50 years, who are illiterate or unable to speak, read, or write the English language.

Then, under this proviso if it is adopted, there will be cooperation between the several States and the Federal Government in the work of inducing those under 21 years of age who can not read or write to take the advantages offered them under the act.

I have a further proviso in this subsection which is not in the original bill, and which reads as follows:

Provided, That any course of education or instruction under this subdivision or under subdivision (e) shall especially include instruction in American history, the fundamentals of civil government, and the principles of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. Allow me to suggest to the Senator that if the second amendment which he proposes to offer and has just read is agreed to, it seems to me there ought to be added to it a provision that hereafter similar work shall not be done by the division of citizens' training now located in the Department of Labor. The amendment proposes, as I understand it, to accomplish work that is already being done in the Bureau of Labor. Has the Senator studied that question at all?

Mr. STERLING. I am not quite sure, I will say to the Senator from Utah, what is being required by the Department of Labor; but, of course, I agree with the Senator that there ought not to be duplication of work under the bill and under any authority or power given to the Department of Labor.

Mr. SMOOT. I am quite sure that if the second amendment, which the Senator has just read, becomes a part of the bill, there is almost certain to be a duplication of work if the Department of Labor insists upon carrying out the program it is now carrying forward. I will not take the time of the Senator now, but I want to call his attention to the great number of these schools that are established in the United States now under that department. It is for the very purpose and, as I understand, carrying out the very theory that is outlined in the amendment which has just been read by the Senator.

Mr. STERLING. I anticipate that if the work is being carried on in any State in the Union under the supervision of the Department of Labor it may well be taken cognizance of by the Secretary of the Interior and by the educational authorities of the several States, and that they will provide the one system that will cover the whole question and cover the subjects enumerated here in subdivision (f).

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is perfectly right in assuming that that is what would be done, but I wish to say to the Senator now that wherever there are two departments of the Government doing exactly the same work, past experience has demonstrated beyond a question of doubt that each one of those departments will labor with more real interest in pushing forward that line of work than if one department alone of the Government had the work in hand.

Duplication of work in the Government is—I was going to say a disgrace to our Government, but I will say it is a disgrace to the Congress to keep appropriating money for the duplication of work that is going on.

Mr. STERLING. I agree with the Senator from Utah in the respect that there is more or less of duplication of work in the various departments and bureaus of the Government. If they are at all allied or even remotely allied, there is more or less duplication of work; but it is up to Congress, I think, to have the courage to provide by law that there shall be no such duplication involving extraordinary and unnecessary expenditures of public funds.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. KING. The Senator has just said something which I think should appeal to every Senator. Now is the chance for us to carry out the splendid and admirable precepts just enunciated by the distinguished Senator. What my colleague says is true—that the Department of Labor, through the Division of American Citizenship Training, is doing this work and doing it well in hundreds and thousands of communities in the United States. We are proposing now to develop the work which they are doing, and instead of using the word "interest," as my colleague did, I say there would be a jealousy if you create this instrumentality between it and the Department of Labor, and that this instrumentality, having more money, would try to crowd out the Department of Labor and assume the entire work.

Mr. STERLING. Without seriously questioning the efficiency of the Department of Labor and the activities of the Department of Labor in this respect, I shall "want to be shown," if I may use the expression, just what the department is doing along those lines before I will concede the point that all that is here provided for and all that is here contemplated is being covered by the Department of Labor.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield again?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. KING. If the Senator had done me the honor to listen to the very long and somewhat tedious speech which I delivered the other day, he would have learned of some of the activities of the Department of Labor, showing the way in which it was entering hundreds and thousands of communities in which it had schools and representatives and the cooperation, and indeed coordination, between the Federal Government and the municipal and State authorities as well as the various industrial plants throughout the United States who are teaching Americanization.

Mr. STERLING. It was not my good fortune to hear the able speech of the Senator from Utah the other day. I was necessarily absent from the Chamber, but I shall take pleasure in investigating the matter further to find out just what the Department of Labor is doing.

But now, Mr. President, a great deal of the argument, and especially the argument of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], has been based upon the theory that the bill is compulsory as to the States, and requires the States to enter into this scheme of the education of illiterates, whether citizens of the United States or aliens. There is nothing further from the mark than that belief. No State in the Union is required against its will to take advantage of the provisions of the bill or to appropriate a single dollar under it. Each State, in order that it may share in the benefits of the bill, must, by act of legislation, accept the provisions of the bill and make appropriations accordingly to meet the appropriations made by the Federal Government.

I think it worth while to call attention to the fact that the Senators who are objecting on that score now may well wait a little and examine the record; and from that they will ascertain that they did not object to the many bills providing for cooperation between the Federal and the State governments. There was no objection to the Morrill Act of 1862, the great land grant act for the benefit of agricultural colleges in the States, giving instruction in agriculture and in the mechanic arts.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. The first Morrill Act, which was passed in the days of President Buchanan—and the later one was very much of the same character—was vetoed by President Buchanan and was opposed by many who believed in our form of government and in the preservation of the rights of the States.

Mr. STERLING. I referred not to the act that was passed during the Buchanan administration, but to the act of 1862, which President Lincoln approved, which act has been most beneficial in its operation ever since, and of which every State in the Union, except, I believe, about four States, which had no agricultural colleges, has been eager to take advantage and eager also to take advantage of every act amendatory of the old Morrill Act and which extended its provisions and benefits.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator allow me to suggest that we have had no proposition made from any of the States to repeal or exempt them from its operations?

Mr. STERLING. No; we have not. I thank the Senator for his suggestion.

I come now to the act of March 4, 1907. Other acts had been passed meanwhile between 1862 and 1907. The act of March 4, 1907, makes appropriations for colleges established under the Morrill Act. It increases the old appropriations and provides for use of part of it in special training of instructors authorized.

Then comes the act of May 8, 1914, providing for cooperative extension work between the agricultural colleges and the Department of Agriculture. The great bill of which the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] had charge, providing for cooperation in farm demonstration and home economics work—what State in the Union, Mr. President, would repudiate that act or deny itself the benefits available under the act? I have not heard of one. There is cooperation. There is no compulsion under the act of 1914 any more than there is under the pending bill. It was left to each State to determine for itself whether it would accept the benefits of the act.

Then comes the act of February 23, 1917, providing for cooperation with the States in the promotion of vocational education, making appropriation and providing the regulations. Have you heard of a single State in the Union that has complained because of the vocational education act—another act providing for cooperation and not compulsory in any sense? The very Senators who are objecting to the pending bill because, under the theory advanced, it is compulsory as between the Federal Government and the States, have been glad enough to share all the benefits provided for in these acts to which I have called attention. But Senators are mistaken in the assumption that this bill compels the States to do anything. It is no more compulsory than any of the acts I have mentioned. The State is free to choose.

Mr. KING. I hope the Senator will acquit me from the general statement which he has just made. I was not here when some of those bills were passed. If I had been, I should have voted against them. One of the bills was passed while I was in the Senate. I not only spoke against the bill but I voted against it. I do not believe in these bribes that are being given to the States; and this is a bribe, as the other bills have been.

Mr. STERLING. I shall allude to that just a little later on if the Senator will be patient.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask if the State of Utah did not accept the advantages under the vocational education bill.

Mr. STERLING. The Senator from Utah can answer.

Mr. KING. I think it did.

Mr. KENYON. The majority of the people of that State do not agree with the Senator's position evidently.

Mr. KING. I think the majority of the people of my State, and the majority of the people of any State in the Union, when you explain to them the operations of this sinister plan, will repudiate the methods that are being pursued and the policy which is being now engrafted upon our Government.

Mr. STERLING. I might cite other acts, cooperative acts we may term them, in a broad way; but I call attention to the last act of June 27, 1918, being an act providing for a Federal Board for Vocational Education and giving that Federal Board for Vocational Education new powers and prescribing new duties in regard to the work of vocational rehabilitation authorized by the terms of the act and authorizing the board to cooperate with such private or public agencies as it might deem advisable.

The Senator from Utah refers to this, although his State has accepted the benefits of these several acts, as a bribe to the several States. I challenge that statement. I deny that it is a bribe to the several States. In the discussion of these questions there is one thing that we lose sight of. This is a dual form of government and it means a dual citizenship. There is a citizenship of the State and a citizenship of the Federal Government, with reciprocal rights, duties, and obligations between the Federal Government and the citizen and between the State government and the citizen of the State. Is the Federal Government interested in the citizenship and in good citizenship? That is the question. Mr. President, let the story revealed by the war and the conscription act tell. Let the story that is being written every day now, with every newspaper coming to our desks containing accounts of the activities and the arrest of radicals who believe in the overthrow of the Government by force or violence—let these tell their stories, and then let us answer the question whether or not the Federal Government is not interested in good citizenship.

Well, what is fundamental in good citizenship? Not education or mental discipline always and alone, but rather that character, individual character, is the greatest fundamental of all. And yet one great object of education is to build and improve character. It is not a complete or perfect system of education until it does take that great element into consideration—character.

Mr. President, this is not paternalism; it is not the Federal Government assuming to dictate, compel, or require education on the part of the different States of the Union. It comes to the States, if we pass the bill, and says, "We agree to cooperate with you, and we will provide so much money in this great work of Americanization and civilization, too, if you yourselves will contribute a share, and that is all there is to it."

It was remarked the other day by some one, in discussing this measure, that it would be detrimental to the public welfare—at least, that was the essence of the statement—to educate. The effect of education, it was said, would be simply to enable men to be more active and ingenious in their activities against the Government. If that is the doctrine laid down, then, Mr. President, let us dispense with education, the schools and colleges, and all the things that we have so devotedly believed in as the means of elevating and ennobling humanity. Let us do away with them.

Why, Mr. President, do we not know that it is the ignorant and alien masses that men like Lenin and Trotski and Berkman and William Z. Foster and women like Emma Goldman prey upon and exploit? Educate these people, and the occupation of these degenerate and evil geniuses is gone. That is the great purpose of this bill, to educate these illiterate aliens in order that they may understand our institutions, and understanding may no longer be a menace to them.

Mr. President, it is a case of neglect. It has been a case of neglect throughout the years; and what is the principle involved? Neglect the child and you are apt to make a delinquent of that child. Here are these children, as it were, so far as knowledge of our American institutions, our laws, our ideals, our traditions, is concerned. They are but children in that respect, and we are inviting them here by the hundreds of thousands. The doors are wide open, and it is likely that that will continue to be our policy. No wonder they are delinquent. It is the very condition most apt to follow from our neglect as to their education, or means of education.

Mr. President, I regret to see the feeling that is manifested toward, or rather against, this bill. Should it become a law, I believe it will be noted as a great landmark in our educational progress. To Americanize these people that come to our shores in such numbers without any of the American spirit, without any knowledge of our institutions, it is necessary that they be educated in that great fundamental—the English language—and that they be taught to speak, read, and write that language. No State, under my amendment, can make the age of education compulsory after the age of 21. There will be no discrimination in the law, but they and our own citizens will stand on the same level. As to all we may say, "Come; we invite you; we urge you now to stand with us upon the same ground with our own American citizens in the various States, to do no more than we require them to do under the provisions of this bill, if it becomes a law." That will appeal to them, and I predict that instead of their feeling alien, and something apart from American ways and institutions, they will appreciate the broad, generous spirit we manifest, and will, with even some enthusiasm, enter into this plan.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, it has been very difficult for me to bring myself to the position of opposing this measure, for I am a believer in the doctrine that where knowledge exists there free government will survive. In the State which I represent in part here we have always appropriated more money for education than for any other purpose, and in the city of New York, where I reside, we have the finest public educational system in the world. But, Mr. President, it seems to me that this legislation, splendid in its conception, will provide a duplication of what is already being done in nearly every State in the Union.

It has been my good fortune recently to look carefully into the school system in the city of New York. I find there that nearly one-fourth of all the money appropriated for our city government is set aside for educational purposes. This year the city of New York will spend for maintaining its public schools alone the sum of $45,000,000, and for the building of new schoolhouses a sum exceeding $6,000,000, all told over $51,000,000. We have in our elementary public schools to-day over 920,000 children and in our high schools and trade schools nearly 70,000, and to teach these boys and girls we have a teaching staff of over 22,000 men and women. I have visited many of the schools in the crowded sections of our city and have observed in some that every single child is of alien birth or immediate alien parentage, all being taught by American teachers the English language and Americanism in its finest sense.

We have a wonderful night-school system in New York City, and in many of them every pupil is a foreigner. The people who attend these schools are taught to read and write the English language. I make the statement here that every person in New York City who cares to learn the English language can obtain a knowledge of it without cost.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire particularly about the night schools. Are the night schools for grown people?

Mr. CALDER. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. And the principal object there is to teach the English language, as I understand?

Mr. CALDER. Yes; that is right.

Mr. NORRIS. I have wondered, and I expect to find out before this discussion is over, why this bill was not framed along some line of that kind. In this particular paragraph that is before us, why would it not be a good plan to have the system the Senator has just described, where the children who ought to go to school are compelled to go? That applies to the foreigners as well as to the Americans?

Mr. CALDER. Yes. Every child in New York City is compelled to go to school up to 14 years.

Mr. NORRIS. Why not do that, and then let the other schools, known as the night schools, take care of the other part of it, although they would not necessarily have to be night schools; but they are not compulsory, are they?

Mr. CALDER. They are not compulsory.

Mr. NORRIS. But they are free?

Mr. CALDER. They are free—free books, free stationery, free teachers, and so forth.

Mr. NORRIS. The city government supplies them, and the principal thing taught there is the English language?

Mr. CALDER. Yes. I might say to the Senator that I have observed in many of these schools men and women who enter without any knowledge of the English language, and there they are given every opportunity to learn it. I have visited dozens of such schools in the crowded foreign sections of our city. I do not know the exact number, but I will venture to say that we have to-day in the city of New York at least 50 schools with night classes; and the great majority of the people in these night classes are adults, alien adults, being taught the rudiments of education. We are doing this at the expense of the city of New York. We do not come here and ask for Federal aid for this purpose.

From some sources in New York State requests have been coming favorable to this sort of legislation; but it seems to me that just at this time, when we are facing a situation whereby we may have to have a bond issue to meet the Nation's obligations, it would be wise to postpone consideration of the whole matter. Splendid as the whole scheme is, we can put it off for this year, and then perhaps we can get a better opportunity to investigate just what is being done throughout the country and see if, after all, this whole thing is not an unnecessary expenditure of money and is not a duplication of the work already being done.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CALDER. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. I notice from the report that besides the night schools that the Senator speaks of in the city of New York there are 39 other schools sustained by donations from philanthropic persons and institutions, and in those 39 schools there are 15,825 foreigners—that is to say that is the average attendance on those schools—and the ages are from 21 up to 50 years, and they are not costing the city a cent. That work is going on, not only in the city of New York but in over 3,000 other cities in the United States. I will say to the Senator that I have the figures here covering every city and giving the number of pupils that are attending, and also giving the names of the donors of the funds which carry on these great schools. I know that this work, which is being carried on so successfully to-day, and is growing every month of every year—for instance, during the month of December there were over 287 of these schools started in different parts of the United States—is going to result in a great deal of good; and I know that if we pass this bill, and the Government provides the money, these people are not going to put it up. The advantage that accrues to the men who give this money, and to the institutions that give it, is in my opinion even greater than the advantage to our country, and I will admit that it is a great advantage to both.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, in my youth I attended a night school of the character described by the Senator from Utah. At the age of 15, being employed during the day, I went to Cooper Institute and attended their night classes, and more than two-thirds of the boys and men, some of them as old as 40, were—of alien birth—taking advantage of the educational opportunities afforded at night, even to a greater extent than the boys born in this country. I am sure the Senate will be interested to know that in the city of New York the young men and women of foreign birth who are required to labor during the day are in the main most earnest in seeking for knowledge.

We also have in this country to-day educational facilities conducted by the Army. I was informed by an Army officer the other night that during the war the Army taught 250,000 young men to read and write, and that to-day all over the country the Army is not only teaching recruits to read and write, but vocational trades as well. So it does seem to me that when the expenses of Government are so large, with the possibility of a duplication of this business throughout the country, we ought to hesitate before passing this bill.

The cost of Government is increasing by leaps and bounds. In Jefferson's administration the figures seem to indicate a cost of about $1.52 per capita per year to conduct the Federal Government. During the four years of the Civil War it cost $25.01 per capita. During the four years succeeding the Civil War $11.02 per capita, while the estimates for the next year will mean a cost for the Federal Government of $47 per capita to conduct the business of this country. So it seems to me we must stop somewhere, and, splendid as this thing is, I think we can very well do without it for this year at least.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to be inserted upon page 7, immediately after line 14, as a part of section 11, in these words:

Provided, That the white races and the negro race shall not attend the same schools, but that separate schools, teachers, and other accommodations shall be provided for the white and negro races.

I ask that the amendment be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That order will be made.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, and ask that it be printed and lie on the table. It is an amendment to section 3 of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I had intended to make a motion to strike out paragraph (e) of section 5. That is the one for which the Senator from South Dakota has offered a substitute, which is the pending amendment. I intended to do that, because it seemed to me that that paragraph was not necessary, although I concede that it is perfectly proper to put in as one of the conditions upon which this money shall be given to the States, some of the things that are in that paragraph. But I want to offer a few suggestions, and I do it as a friend of this kind of legislation. I desire to have a bill here that I can vote for. I believe it is all right for us to make some provision to assist in the education of some of the citizens of the States if we can do it with the proper safeguards.

I have a great deal of sympathy with the argument just made by the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. Much as I should like to go even further than this bill goes, I realize that we are up against a proposition in a financial way that demands that we should consider very seriously any step that we may be asked to take in the expenditure of money that is not absolutely necessary. So I have a good deal of sympathy with the thought of postponing this kind of legislation, although I do not believe that I would be led to vote against the right kind of a bill on that argument, as much as I believe it is weighty. I wish, however, that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], all members of the committee that reported this bill, would listen to the suggestions I have to make, realizing that I am making them as a friend of this kind of legislation, consider them, and see whether an amendment along the line I am going to suggest would not be acceptable.

Let me say, first, that I have no sympathy with the idea that this is trying to interfere with State legislation. We are proposing here to give to the States certain Federal sums on certain conditions. It is not an attempt, as I read the bill, to interfere with the educational system of any State. It is perfectly proper for a State to refuse to comply with these conditions and not get the money, if it wants to; and when it does comply with them, it still controls the educational facilities of the State and its schools. But there are two classes of people that this bill seeks to educate, and I am seriously wondering whether, particularly at this time, one of those classes might not be left out of the bill.

First, there are the illiterates, without regard to citizenship. They may be American citizens or foreigners, either one. Second, there is the other class, consisting of those aliens or people living here who can not speak or read or write the English language. It occurs to me that particularly under present conditions I would at least feel better satisfied if we confined our energy and the expenditure of our money for the purpose of giving it to the States to be used in connection with their money for the purpose of teaching the English language to those who can not speak it or write it or read it at the present time.

One of the conditions in this particular paragraph requires the States to teach illiterates—illiterates who are over 21 years of age, grown people. They must do that.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I think the Senator puts it a little strongly there. It does not "require."

Mr. NORRIS. Is not the word "require" used in the amendment?

Mr. STERLING. It is in subdivision (e).

Mr. NORRIS. That is the one I am discussing now.

Mr. STERLING. The limitation there is 21 years.

Mr. NORRIS. The word "penalty" is stricken out. It says "require all residents, who are citizens of the United States," or aliens, "16 years of age or over."

This is the point I want to make: I believe in education, and I believe in compulsory education. I am willing to support a proposition that we shall not turn any money over to a State that does not have the proper kind of compulsory education. But I do not believe in compulsory education for grown people. It seems to me that is illogical.

Mr. STERLING. It is not compulsory, under this amendment, after the age of 21. It applies to 16 or over and under 21.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; the compulsory education ought to commence with the child when he is able to go to school—when he is 6, 7, or 8 years old. I think in almost all States the compulsion ends at 16 years. It sometimes goes up to 18. I would not quibble about it, whether it stops at 16 or 18. But compulsory education, in my judgment, ought to be confined to children; and I believe in it. I am in favor of a compulsory-education law.

When we get to grown persons, even though they can not speak the English language, I would not compel them. I believe it will be a failure if you try to compel grown people to go to school. I would throw out every inducement possible. Let the school be free; supply them with books and everything necessary; have it in the evening if necessary. That would probably be the right time to have it, when men and women who are working in the daytime could attend a night school and learn the English language. I do not believe it is going to be necessary to make it compulsory, because, as the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] has described, most people—at least, worthy people—unless they are away along in advanced years, are glad of the opportunity, when they come to this country in good faith, to learn the English language, and they all ought to learn it.

Therefore I do not like these requirements which you are going to put upon the State—to compel the State to teach grown illiterates, born in America, who have lived here all their lives and speak the English language, to give them an education after they are grown, and make that one of the conditions. It would be a good thing if they did it. I am not arguing against that, because I am one of those who believe that while education is not the only thing it is one of the great things that make good citizens.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I myself have been a little disturbed about how you are going to determine accurately who are illiterate and who can not read or write. Is this machinery to be so extensive as to make a test of that in all cases?

Mr. NORRIS. I presume under the bill if there was a question as to whether they were complying with the Federal statute, it would be passed on by the Secretary of the Interior. A case might arise where that might be a very difficult question to decide.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I was just going to suggest whether it will not be determined by the State authorities, who will really have the administration of this law in hand? Will not the State superintendent of schools, for example, know from the different counties in the State who are illiterate?

Mr. TOWNSEND. How would he know?

Mr. STERLING. He will know it from the county authorities. For example, the county superintendent of schools will know who are the illiterates in his county, undoubtedly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Do you make provision for a census?

Mr. STERLING. No; there is no provision for it.

Mr. NORRIS. I presume the census that is being taken now would disclose that, as far as the number is concerned. It would show how many illiterates there are in every locality and in every State.

Mr. STERLING. That would be the most obvious means.

Mr. NORRIS. I think so.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. May I ask the Senator how this law could be enforced by the States? In most States the compulsory law provides that a child from 8 years old until 16 shall attend school a certain number of months during the year. In my own State we have compulsory education, the law providing that every child above the age of 8 years and under the age of 16 shall go to school nine months during the year. That applies to every child in the State. If the parents of the child are so poor that they are unable to send the child to school, the municipality or the township must provide means for the child, it must purchase books for the child, and see that it is sent to school nine months during the year. My question is, How are you going to enforce that law by having a Federal statute which provides that a person above the age of 16 years shall be compelled to go to school when there is no such provision in the State law?

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, all this law does is to provide that the Secretary of the Interior must be satisfied by the proper State authorities that certain things are done by the State or the State does not get any share of the fund.

Mr. GRONNA. Then the State which has a law providing for the education of boys or girls only up to the age of 16 would get no benefit unless the law is changed?

Mr. NORRIS. I should say that is right.

Mr. KENYON. Unless they provided for compulsory education, for teaching in English from 16 to 21, 200 hours a year. If they did not do that, then they would get no benefit out of the law.

Mr. GRONNA. The law in my State provides for attendance in public schools. It means English schools, of course. In some States they prohibit the teaching of any other language except English.

Mr. KENYON. Those in the schools in the Senator's State, of course, would not be illiterate, and they would not be compelled to attend instruction in English after 16. But some might have come in from the outside who never attended school, who were illiterate. They would have to attend.

Mr. GRONNA. That is my understanding. But how would this apply to a State like my own State?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think it would apply. Unless your State amended its law it would not get any of the money. That would be the effect of it.

Mr. GRONNA. It would be very difficult to agree on a provision that a boy or girl shall be compelled to attend school until the age of 21.

Mr. NORRIS. I think so. That is one of the things I am arguing against.

Mr. KENYON. They are not compelled to attend school until they are 21. They are compelled merely between 16 and 21 to attend such classes of instruction in English as the State may provide, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. There can be night schools, there can be groups, private schools, any kind of school. But I did not intend to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator. All I am trying to do is to get all the light I can on the question.

Mr. KENYON. The rule is laid down that an illiterate is one who can not read or write English.

Mr. NORRIS. That would mean any language.

Mr. KENYON. If you had none of those in your State above 16 years of age, of course this law would have no effect whatever on the Senator's State, and they would not take any advantage of it, or desire to; it would do no good. But if you had persons from 16 to 21 or beyond who were illiterate, then it would do good, and your State would have to pass a law providing for the teaching of English to those between 16 and 21, and then they would take advantage of it 200 hours a year.

Mr. GRONNA. Before it could get any of the appropriation provided for it in the bill?

Mr. KENYON. Absolutely.

Mr. GRONNA. I am quite familiar with the conditions in my State, and I have been very much interested in the school question. I consider that one of the greatest honors I ever had conferred upon me was to be made president of our school board for a number of years, and I am in favor of anything which will help to educate the people of my State or any other State.

With the permission of the Senator from Nebraska, I am glad to say that we have not any such number of illiterates in my State as is shown on that chart. We do have a number of people who can not read English, but there are many of them highly educated in some other language. We have very few people in North Dakota who are unable to read in some language.

Mr. KENYON. The figures on the chart relate to illiterates and non-English-speaking people.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. As I understand the chart, it is not confined to illiterates, but it relates to illiterates and non-English speaking. They are combined in one chart. So while the Senator's State might not have a single illiterate in it, if it had in it people who could not speak or write the English language, they would be included in the list on that chart.

Mr. GRONNA. My interest in this measure particularly is to see that it shall benefit people between the ages of 16 and 21—and we have a number of them—who have come to the State and who have not had the opportunity of attending school. If they had been there they would have had to attend or their parents or guardians would have been prosecuted. They would get no benefit whatever from this law unless the State should amend its law to conform with this Federal statute, a proposition which is very difficult of accomplishment. It is very difficult for the reason that every State, through a term of years, has worked out a certain plan upon which it proceeds with reference to education. I think it is true of every Western State. I know it is in the State of the Senator from South Dakota, because I am quite familiar with the situation there.

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator will permit me, and if the Senator from Nebraska will permit, in order to show what a State might do under this Federal statute, I call attention to a couple of paragraphs in the statute passed in 1919 in my own State, and these two paragraphs correspond in a broad way, respectively, to subdivisions (e) and (f) of the pending bill, and of the substitute I have offered. Section 1 of the act reads:

> All persons between the ages of 16 and 21 years, inclusive, who are not physically or mentally disqualified, and who do not possess the ability to speak, read, and write the English language as is required for the completion of the fifth grade in public schools of this State, shall attend public evening school classes for at least eight hours each week during the entire time that evening school classes of the proper grade shall be in session in the school district within 5 miles of his or her place of residence or until the necessary ability has been acquired: Provided, That regular attendance at a public day or part-time school shall be accepted in place of attendance at evening school classes.

Mr. NORRIS. What is the age provided there?

Mr. STERLING. Sixteen to twenty-one; and that is according to the terms of subdivision (e). Now, coming to the proviso according to subdivision (f), you will see that it is simply permissive; it is not compulsory at all. It reads:

> Provided, That any person or persons more than 21 years of age and less than 50, who do not possess the ability to read, write, and speak the English language equivalent to the requirements for the fifth grade in our State course of study for the common schools, may attend during good behavior free of charge any of the special classes established under the provisions of this act.

That is permissive as to all who are over 21 and under 50.

Mr. TOWNSEND. How is that law working in your State?

Mr. STERLING. I am not advised.

Mr. NORRIS. It has just recently been passed.

Mr. STERLING. It was recently passed, in 1919, and I am not apprised as to how it is working.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator does not know whether his State is afflicted with a large percentage of ignorance?

Mr. STERLING. It is not afflicted with a very large percentage of ignorance or a very large percentage of aliens.

Mr. TOWNSEND. And there could not very many people take advantage of this proposed law who would not be cared for under the law of the Senator's State?

Mr. STERLING. No; not very many.

Mr. NORRIS. They would probably be all cared for. The only thing is that the Senator's State would get some Federal funds.

Mr. STERLING. I imagine that if States wanted to accept the benefits of this law they would pass some such statute as that and would meet the requirements, especially of subdivision (e) as proposed to be amended.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator will allow me again, the provision of that law as passed in the Senator's State is, as he says, permissive. This Federal law will be compulsory.

Mr. STERLING. No; there are two subdivisions here. Subdivision (e) makes education compulsory between the ages of 16 and 21, without reference to whether they are aliens or citizens. Subdivision (f) corresponds to the provision last read, which is permissive, and permits persons between 21 and 50 to attend these special classes.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] must remember that this law does not pretend to make it compulsory; but if we should adopt the amendment that is now pending it would say to the State, "You must make it compulsory; and if you do not, you can not get any Federal funds; but if you do, you get them."

Mr. GRONNA. I see.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me that we ought to add any requirement we desire about the compulsory education of children within school age, and we should then require the State to have free schools to teach the English language to those within its borders who can not speak, read, or write the English language. I am not so particular as to how long that should be. I would want it myself long enough to be effective. I would want it to be so that we would bring about the use of the English language as much as we can by all the people who live in the country. I think what has happened in various States during the war has taught us a good many lessons along this line. I know I have modified a good many of my views, or, rather, I have gotten new ideas that I did not have before, when we found in some localities that there were so many people who could not speak, read, or write the English language. Yet we ought to remember, it seems to me, what I, at least, believe to be true, that when you take a grown person and compel him by law to go to school, even though the time may be short, you are undertaking a proposition that I think ought not to be done by the Government. I know the answer comes, "We would like to educate the people who are now living so that they would use the English language"; and I would like to see that done. I would like to throw out every possible inducement to get them into these schools. Most of them will come in without compulsion. Some will come in without compulsion who would try to avoid it if you tried to compel them to come.

But the law, if founded upon the lines that I have outlined, would start at the bottom and build up a citizenship. It would be some years before this result would appear, but it seems to me that must be true. We can not expect immediate results. We ought to require the States to commence with the children, to compel them to go to school and to offer free facilities for those who are grown to learn the English language. Within the course of the coming generation we would see its effects. In a very few years we would have a better educated citizenship; we would have a greater use of the English language everywhere.

As to the schools that we ought to require the States to provide for the children, if there is any doubt about it it seems to me we could provide that they should be conducted in the English language. Probably that would be done anyway, but there would not be any objection to putting it in the bill, and thus bring about a knowledge of the English language just as far as we can.

In my judgment we would make a mistake if we tried to force any language on anybody. It has never yet succeeded; but proper inducements held out will bring into these schools people of all ages who are here in earnest and who are going to stay here and be citizens of the United States and learn our language.

I do not understand why the committee is not willing to amend the bill along those lines. They are running against a great many objections, and I think serious objections, when they undertake to require by compulsion, even indirectly, the attendance of grown people upon schools.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TRAMMELL in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. I may be entirely mistaken, but is it not possible that economic conditions may enter into the question? Is it not possible that a boy above 18 or a girl above 18 may have dependents? It is, then, a question of whether it is possible for that boy or that girl to surrender his or her time.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes. Of course, this particular bill, I will say to the Senator, does not contemplate very much time being spent in going to school. It is only 200 hours a year. The State would make provision for that and probably provide for night schools. But the question which the Senator raises would certainly arise unless there were night schools, because there are a great many people who are from 16 to 21 years of age who have to work all the time in order to support others, a dependent invalid father or mother or sister or some one of that kind.

Mr. GRONNA. I am not a member of the committee and I have not given it special attention, but I was wondering if that matter was taken into consideration, because I think it is a question of some concern. I believe that while perhaps not to a large extent yet to some extent that question would have to be solved.

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. STERLING. I realize that is a matter of some concern when we come to make education compulsory for those over 21 years of age. A man over 21 years of age may be the head of a family or may be in very moderate or straitened circumstances; he may be the breadwinner of the family, and it will be very difficult for him to give 200 hours a year for attending school. Hence that is my purpose in proposing the substitute.

Mr. NORRIS. You still have up to 21 years where it is compulsory; and in many cases it would be harder for a boy who has, perhaps, lost a father by death and who may have an invalid mother to support to be required to go to school in this way. It might be a physical impossibility for such a boy to go to school.

Aside from that, and in a much broader sense, grown people will not take kindly to a compulsory-education system. I do not believe it would work.

Mr. STERLING. Does the Senator mean by "grown people" those above 21 or less than 21 years of age?

Mr. NORRIS. For the purpose of this bill, I will say I mean by "grown people" those between 18 and 21 years of age. They are grown people. Indeed, in most States girls 18 years of age are of legal age; they are out from under the control of their parents, legally speaking, and they have the same power in law that they will have when they are 75 years old.

As I said a while ago, what has been brought out during the war has opened the eyes of a great many people. To me it has shown the importance of doing everything that we can for increasing the use of the English language. It is desirable to have everyone in the country, particularly those who are citizens or who are going to become citizens, learn to read and write the English language; and when we permit people to come from foreign countries, seeking a new home and a new citizenship, we ought to take steps to see that they are not grouped, as they have been in the past, where they see no one and talk with no one except those who use their language and who have come from the same country.

We ought to remember that, whether we like it or not, there is a burden upon us; and we have been to blame to a great degree because in the past that burden has not been assumed. There is a burden upon us to see that these people are given the opportunity to learn our language. In my judgment, if we do that, education and the learning of our own language will go a great way to avoid the dangers that come from anarchy, from a misunderstanding of our system of government and our ways of living. Many of these people have not had opportunities to get out from under the influences that controlled them even in the countries from which they emigrated. We ought to give them an opportunity to understand our Government, to understand our society, to become one with us, to become the right kind of citizens. I am not averse to spending public Federal funds in order to bring that about.

I think the bill would be an instrumentality of that kind if it were amended as I have suggested; if we would eliminate from it entirely the proposition of practically everything except the teaching of the English language. That will not do it all, but it is the greatest one thing of all to make an American citizen, first to have him learn the English language. He may be a bad citizen afterwards; he may be an anarchist afterwards; it may not and will not in all cases bring about a cure for such things. I would not offer it as a panacea, but it would be one of the greatest Americanizing factors that we can possibly provide for, in my humble judgment. I should like to confine the use of the Federal funds to carrying out that idea.

It seems to me that when we have carried that out we have gone as far as we ought to go with Federal funds, at least now. There may come a time later when I might be in favor of taking up the question of illiteracy also, but to my mind this is the pressing thing. We ought to lay the foundation now for a better citizenship. Let the American language be understood by everybody.

I hope that the Senators who have given a great deal of time to this and who have had the benefit of the hearings and the considerations of the committee will take heed of the debate that has taken place and of the opposition to the bill. Let us not run any danger of killing what I believe would be a very good thing by taking in something that I believe they will think after awhile is unnecessary by doing something in the way of compulsory education that I think is undesirable.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I want to get clearly in my mind the Senator's position. Would he leave the illiterates out of the bill entirely?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I would.

Mr. KENYON. And confine it strictly to the non-English speaking?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator would have no compulsory education required in the States?

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. KENYON. No compulsory speaking of English, but merely the States having free schools for those who desire to attend?

Mr. NORRIS. I have said "yes" to the Senator's question. I do not want the Senator to understand that I am trying to draw the line there and that I am going to stand there. I am willing to compromise on the bill. On the compulsory part of education in the schools by the States as would be required by the law I would have no objection if before you gave the State any of the money you compelled the State to have a compulsory system of education for children, say, between 7 and 16 years of age.

Mr. KENYON. Nearly all States have that.

Mr. NORRIS. Most of them have. I would not have any objection to compelling that; that would help illiteracy; but I would leave the illiteracy part out, and in that respect it would help to remove illiteracy just as much as it would assist the language proposition. I would have no objection to putting in the law a provision that the States must provide not only for compulsory education but that those schools must be held and conducted in the English language. I think they all are anyway, but I have no possible objection to putting that in the bill.

Mr. KENYON. That is, up to 16 years of age?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. What would the Senator do between 16 and 21—the same thing?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I would not do anything except as the language proposition comes in. I would provide for language schools. Let the State, before it can get any of the money provided for by the law, provide for free open schools to teach the English language to those who can not speak or write it, and without regard to age. Commence at 16 and go up to 75. Let anybody come who wants to learn the English language. I think I would stop about there.

Mr. KENYON. Of course the Senator would have illiterates attend?

Mr. NORRIS. There would be no objection to their attending, but the illiterate might be an American who could not speak anything but the English language.

Mr. KENYON. An illiterate who could speak the English language might be one who could not read or write the English language.

Mr. NORRIS. He could not read or write, but he would have to speak some language.

Mr. KENYON. Yes; he might speak the English language.

Mr. NORRIS. It might be the English language that he would speak.

Mr. KENYON. Of course the proposition is a difficult one.

Mr. NORRIS. I know it is a difficult question.

Mr. KENYON. Our idea has been to get some legislation that would amount to something and that would pass. If we can not pass legislation that amounts to something, let us not pass any.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator does not mean to say the suggestion that I have made would not amount to anything?

Mr. KENYON. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. NORRIS. I think that would be going a good way. I think that would be accomplishing something. Here is what it would result in: It would result in every State in the Union, very likely, having a compulsory system of education for its children. That would apply to all the children. The school would always be conducted in the English language, and the common-school age is ordinarily, I think, 16 years. That would accomplish a great good.

If every State in the Union had a compulsory system of education, we would soon see the effect in our citizenship. We would have an educated citizenship; they would all be educated. I think that would be going in the right direction and would accomplish a great deal.

The next thing is to give every foreigner who comes to the country an opportunity, without expense and regardless of age, to learn the English language. I think that is another step that is pretty good. It would bring about a great improvement in our citizenship.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, January 23, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 22, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God, our Heavenly Father, who lives, loves, and reigns; ever constant in Thy ministrations to Thy children, physically, mentally, morally, spiritually; help us to reciprocate by loyalty to Thee, ourselves, and our fellow men, loyal to Thy Kingdom, our Government, and to all mankind. In Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. JACOWAY, for seven days, on account of sickness.

To Mr. CARTER, for to-day and to-morrow, on account of sickness.

To Mr. CASEY, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

WIDOWS' PENSIONS—CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that H. R. 11538, to repeal certain provisions of the act of March 3, 1889 (30th Stats. L., p. 1379), relating to widows' pensions, be rereferred to the Committee on Revision of the Laws.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the bill designated by him be rereferred from the Committee on Invalid Pensions to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing resolutions of a chapter of the American Legion on the question of a bonus for ex-service members.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing resolutions of the American Legion relative to a bonus for ex-service members. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I presume every Member of Congress has received just such resolutions not alone from one particular chapter of this organization but from many of them. Now, if one Member of Congress puts in a particular resolution that he has received, then every other Member would likewise be authorized to put in not one but several, and the RECORD would be filled with them.

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. These resolutions embody the sentiments of the State organization of the State of Michigan.

Mr. BLANTON. Then I shall not object.

Mr. GARD. Further reserving the right to object, is this from a local organization?

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan. These resolutions are from a city organization, but they embody practically the resolutions of the State organization.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

POINT OF NO QUORUM.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. It is quite evident that there is no quorum present.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

On motion by Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the river and harbor appropriation bill, H. R. 11892, with Mr. HUSTED in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H. R. 11892, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. At the time the committee rose on Tuesday there were 12 minutes remaining for general debate, 5 minutes under the control of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENNEDY] and 7 minutes under the control of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Will the gentleman from North Carolina use his time now?

Mr. SMALL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, there is some justification for a resort to camouflage by an army engaged in deadly conflict with an enemy, but at no time and upon no occasion is there any excuse for a Member of Congress or for a dominant political party in Congress resorting to camouflage, because here our acts relate to and affect only our friendly constituents in peace times.

There is hardly an appropriation bill presented to the House during the present era that our friends on the majority side do not announce to the people in clarion tones that they have cut down estimates and have practiced economy for the people. [Applause.] Well may you applaud, because you know that such statements that you make to the country are camouflage pure and simple. [Applause.] True economy, genuine economy, means that not a dollar will be appropriated by the Congress of the United States unless the Congress knows where that money is going to be expended. [Applause.]

You speak of a $12,000,000 river and harbor bill as a matter of supreme economy. I want to say to you that not a member of the invisible but always active and yet ever dominating steering committee of the majority can tell the country right now where one single dollar in this river and harbor $12,000,000 lump-sum blanket appropriation bill is going to be expended. You do not know where it is going. You do not know upon what project it is going to be expended; and I want to say that it is not economy, but it is the rankest extravagance, and the people of the country know it.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I regret I can not yield. I have only five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BLANTON. In passing the last appropriation bill you told the country that you had cut down estimates and practiced the greatest economy, and yet you had voted and passed an increase of over $70,000,000 above the estimates of the department on one single section. When there was a provision in that bill of less than $1,000,000, to give us a proper air service, the distinguished, ever alert, astute, wise counselor and colleague from Illinois, the matchless gentleman, Mr. MADDEN [applause], told us that if we passed that appropriation it would terminate in the biggest pork-barrel grab that had ever been known in the history of the House. I was astounded when he made such a statement. He led us to believe that it would merely be a matching of wits between the Members of the House with the greatest political influence as to where that money would be spent. I could not believe that he knew what he was talking about. But the distinguished chairman of that committee, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON], conclusively proved the truth of it in his statement that a year ago when the committee raised the appropriation 800 per cent he took occasion to question the Assistant Postmaster General, Mr. Praeger, as to when they could expect aeroplane service for the Twin Cities—Minneapolis and St. Paul, in his home State of Minnesota, if you please—and he said that Mr. Praeger assured him that he would have it in three months' time, and he said that that assurance by the Post Office Department got the Minnesota vote, because, forsooth, the Assistant Postmaster General promised some pork barrel to the chairman's State of Minnesota, proving conclusively the statement that had been made by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I can not refuse to yield to my genial friend from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. Does the gentleman mean to insinuate that Mr. STEENERSON said he would deliver the Minnesota vote in return for aeroplane service?

Mr. BLANTON. Not that he would do it, but that he did it, and here is his language. He said—

That, of course, got the Minnesota vote for the appropriation.

He said that on page 1578 of the RECORD, concerning the proposed air service appropriation, as follows:

Mr. STEENERSON. * * * I want to call your attention to the fact that a year ago, when we granted the increase of 800 per cent, I asked Mr. Praeger if they were going to extend the service to St. Paul and Minneapolis. I said I did not believe in the service except as an experiment. I said, "If you are going to extend it, are you going to carry it to the Twin Cities?" I will read from page 54 of last year's hearings on the appropriation bill:

"Mr. STEENERSON. You have not gotten to Chicago yet?

"Mr. PRAEGER. Sunday week we will get there—on the 15th of December.

"Mr. STEENERSON. And then what time will you get to Minneapolis and St. Paul?

"Mr. PRAEGER. In the spring. That is the only promise we can make, because we have problems to solve connected with winter flying which we are going to solve on the New York-Chicago route. If that swings well and we have fairly reasonable weather, we will get into Minneapolis in March, 1919."

That, of course, got the Minnesota vote for the appropriation. He has never extended it to Minneapolis.

Mr. BLANTON. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the well-posted gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is wise and correct when he says that the Congress should defeat a proposed lump-sum blanket appropriation of only $850,000—less than one million—designed to experiment with, perfect, and carry on a proper aero mail service, because such action would result in pork-barrel grabbing, the Members with the greatest political influence obtaining the money spent in and the service for their own particular districts, what is the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] now going to say concerning this bill, when not a paltry $850,000 is involved, but when $12,000,000 are to be appropriated by Congress in a blanket lump-sum appropriation, with no one knowing where it is to be expended? Will not his statement remain true, that the Members with the greatest political influence will still be able to get the major portion of this $12,000,000 expended in their district? If not, why not? The gentleman from Illinois must be consistent as well as wise. I shall vote against this lump-sum appropriation bill because, as well said, it is a spareribb measure, from which the people of the United States may expect all bone and no meat of value to them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. SMALL. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE].

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I send to the Clerk's desk a telegram and ask that it be read in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman presents a telegram and asks that it be read in his time. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. What is it about?

Mr. IGOE. About this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

ST. LOUIS, MO., January 20, 1920.

Hon. WILLIAM L. IGOE, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

The newspapers and commercial interests of St. Louis are vigorously protesting against the niggardly appropriations for waterway improvements suggested by the chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee. Transportation is the vital need of the Mississippi Valley at this time, and the use of our navigable waterways is the only means of securing the needed relief. In pursuing a policy that will cripple the commerce of our country and retard its further development we will be following the most expensive policy that can be imagined. We hope that you will personally protest against it and use your influence upon others to do likewise.

MISSISSIPPI VALLEY WATERWAYS ASSOCIATION,
JAMES E. SMITH, President.

Mr. IGOE. Also the following telegram, Mr. Chairman.

The Clerk read as follows:

ST. LOUIS, MO., January 21, 1920.

Hon. WILLIAM L. IGOE, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

The suggested river and harbor bill is meeting with general disapproval of the Merchants' Exchange of St. Louis. We hope you will vigorously protest against the small amount of appropriation and do all you can to secure a proper increase. We feel that the provisions of the Newton bill should be promptly approved by Congress, as it asks for nothing more than has already been promised by Congress, and the promise should now be fulfilled. The policy suggested will, in our opinion, meet with the condemnation of the commercial interests of the entire Mississippi Valley.

CHARLE. L. NEIMEIER, President.
EUGENE SMITH, Secretary.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to incorporate in my remarks two other telegrams on the same subject from other associations in St. Louis.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RHODES].

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, since the convening of the Sixty-sixth Congress on the 19th day of last May I have endeavored to follow the leadership on the majority side of the House in the support of all legislation that has been presented. During this time questions have come up about which I was in doubt, and in all such cases I cheerfully surrendered my own judgment to that of the committee. The question involved in this bill, however, is of such broad and deep significance that I find myself unable to follow the committee in this instance. This matter involves a question which strikes at one of the greatest problems—I should say at one of the greatest domestic problems—in all this country. That is the question of transportation. I come from the interior of the great Mississippi Valley territory. I have the honor to represent the district in which I was born and reared, and which comprises about 100 miles of Mississippi River territory on that stretch of the river between the mouth of the Ohio and the mouth of the Missouri. When I heard the chairman of this committee day before yesterday explain the objects and purposes of this bill, I could not refrain from the conclusion that if he could only see as I have seen, and as other people in the Mississippi Valley now see, the necessity for larger transportation facilities, he could never conscientiously defend the present river and harbor bill. When I heard the eloquent and distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] seek to defend the provisions of this bill, I could not but feel that if he only knew as much of the possibilities from an industrial viewpoint of the great Mississippi Valley territory as did a distinguished historian of his State 100 years ago he could not maintain the position he took day before yesterday.

What we need is more generous appropriations for the improvement of our internal waterways, and more substantial improvements.

Under the present and past methods of river improvement the commerce of the Mississippi Valley has not only suffered but many river towns have suffered irreparable financial loss. In some cases in my own district certain towns are threatened with inundation, and others are cut off from the main channel on account of the formation of bars and islands. I respectfully call attention to the following examples. I have in mind a certain point on the Mississippi River in Perry County, Mo., which is known as "Belgique Landing." At this point the channel of this great river has divided itself into three chutes, and if the channel was confined where it properly belongs, instead of having been converted into three distinct streams, there would be only one channel. That part of the channel next to the Missouri shore is known as the "Missouri Chute," the middle channel as the "Middle Chute," and the stream on the Illinois side is known as the "Illinois Chute." By keeping up the fence which was built some years ago across the Belgique Chute to the island separating the Middle and Missouri Chutes, the Belgique Landing would be safely protected. As it now is all the dredge boats on the Mississippi River under the present method of operation can not prevent the inundation and washing away of the town of Belgique unless something be done. By building a similar fence on the Illinois side the entire volume of water would then be confined to the Middle Chute, where it naturally belongs, and the channel thus confined could be depended upon to do its own dredging. The Missouri side, practically all the way down from St. Louis to the city of Ste. Genevieve, is a rock shore, while on the Illinois side they have soft alluvial banks. These banks easily erode, and the result is, on account of the erosion of the banks on the Illinois side and the great amount of sediment that is being precipitated in this part of the Mississippi River, which is just south of the mouth of the Missouri, this part of the river is difficult to control. It should be remembered that the Missouri River carries perhaps a greater amount of sediment per cubic yard than any other river in the United States; and, as a matter of philosophy, when the water of the Missouri comes in contact with the water of the Mississippi, there is a tendency to precipitation. Hence this silting process builds up the bed of the river, which, with the erosion of the Illinois banks, cause the water to draw away from the Missouri side and the formation of bars and islands along our shore.

Further up on the river, at Ste. Genevieve, we find this situation of things: Ste. Genevieve is not only the oldest town in Missouri, but is one of the most beautiful little cities on the Mississippi River from its mouth to its source. At Ste. Genevieve the old boat landing, on account of a great bar and an island having been formed in the river, has been completely destroyed, and to-day the landing is about 3 miles north of the city. The fact is, the city of Ste. Genevieve no longer boasts of her old-time boat landing, but instead has stretched out before her a long ragged island. I call attention to this matter to show the shifting nature of the channel of the river here, and to urge more liberal appropriations and substantial improvements. South of the city of Ste. Genevieve the shore situation changes. We have on our side the alluvial banks, and on the Illinois side is the rock shore. The tendency here is for the river to wash away the Missouri shore; consequently our people suffer great loss, and our river transportation has been almost entirely destroyed.

To show positively how the Mississippi River has been neglected the last 100 years, and how commerce has suffered on account of the same, I beg to call attention to the following bit of history which is both interesting and instructive:

In the year 1818 Henry R. Schoolcraft, a naturalist, scientist, and historian of the State of New York, was sent out under joint authority of that State and the Federal Government to explore the upper Louisiana Territory. An account of his explorations is recorded in a book which I hold in my hand, entitled "A Journal of a Tour Into the Interior of Missouri and Arkansas in 1818 and 1819," by Henry R. Schoolcraft, published by Sir Richard Phillips & Co., of London, in the year 1821. An account of these same travels and adventures is found in an American publication entitled "Scenes and Adventures in the Semi-Alpine Region of the Ozark Mountains of Missouri and Arkansas," by Henry Rowe Schoolcraft, published by Lippincott, Grambo & Co., of Philadelphia, in 1853, and dedicated to the memory of DeWitt Clinton, one time governor of New York.

Omitting further preliminaries, Mr. Schoolcraft, on Thursday, November 5, 1818, after having spent four months in the vicinity of Potosi, Mo., made the statement that the chief industry in that locality was lead mining; that over 9,360,000 pounds of lead had been smelted there between 1798 and 1816 and hauled to Ste. Genevieve, Mo., for shipment down the Mississippi to New Orleans.

July 19, previous, Mr. Schoolcraft tells of his first visit to Ste. Genevieve, Mo., then a town of about 3,000 people, containing several stores, a post office, a branch of the Missouri Bank, a courthouse, and a Roman Catholic Church. He described it as a thriving town and the principal point on the Mississippi River from which lead at that time was exported. He tells of great stacks of pig lead on the banks of the Mississippi River for shipment to New Orleans.

July 23, 1818, Mr. Schoolcraft tells of reaching the town of Herculaneum, Mo., on the Mississippi about 30 miles north of Ste. Genevieve. He describes this as a thriving village possessing several stores, a post office, a courthouse, a school, a jail, and three shot towers. Moses Austin is said to have owned the shot towers, and there made all the bullets used by Gen. Jackson at the Battle of New Orleans. Here, as at Ste. Genevieve, the lead was obtained from the lead mines at Potosi, Mo., and hauled overland to Herculaneum, Mo., for export purposes down the Mississippi River.

If Mr. Schoolcraft could return to-day and stand where he stood 100 years ago at Ste. Genevieve, he would not only fail to see the piles of lead and other products stacked on the river banks for export, but he would find the channel of the river so changed as to make it impossible to land boats at the old barge landing of that day. In fact, the boat landing, on account of the changing of the channel and the formation of a large island and numerous sand bars in the river near the Ste. Genevieve shore, has been gradually forced north, until to-day it is 3 miles from the city of Ste. Genevieve, and the usefulness of the river at this historic point as a carrier of commerce entirely destroyed. One hundred years ago Mr. Schoolcraft describes Ste. Genevieve as an important shipping point on the Mississippi River, situated on high ground overlooking the beautiful Gabarie Valley, and a monument to the early French people in the days of Indian supremacy.

These are a few of many cases I could name which show the effect of an improper system of river improvement. I am compelled to say that 75 per cent of all the money expended on this stretch of the river has been a waste both from a financial and economic standpoint. The trouble is the system is wrong.

The following lines are taken from a tribute to Missouri Territory written by Mr. Schoolcraft in 1819, after he had visited Ste. Genevieve, Potosi, St. Louis, and all the upper Louisiana Territory:

"All countries and climates, the bond and the free,
The people, the wilderness, closely agree,
From Maine's rocky borders the emigrants pour,
And are leaving the fruitful Connecticut shore;
The Hudson, Potomac, and Delaware sigh
For friends who had quit them, they hardly knew why;
The exiles of Europe, the poor, the oppressed,
All, all, they are bending their steps to the West.
One object impels them, one passion inspires—
The range for improvement, for wealth the desires;
And alike in all countries, conditions, and States,
This passion is cherished, prevails, and inflates;
The rich in it see an increase of estate,
And the poor are still flattered by hopes to be great.
Thus season on season new converts engage,
And support and augment the migratory rage;
Now here and now there its direction it turns,
On Wabash it kindles, on Miami burns,
And now on the fertile Scioti delights,
And now on the Washitaw fondly invites;
Still changing, each season new regions display,
No boundaries check it, no streams can allay,
No land is too distant, no climate too hot,
No forest too heavy, no streams too remote;
They move, they inhabit, they cultivate all,
And were oceans no check, would encompass the ball;
Even now they approach my extensive domain,
And Missouri already is peopled with men."

As a final reference to the way Mr. Schoolcraft was impressed with the wonderful resources of the country, he closed with the following stanza from Pope's Letters:

The things we saw are rich and rare, but how the devil came they there?

In conclusion let me repeat, what we most need in the Mississippi Valley is greater transportation facilities. We believe the Mississippi River is the natural outlet over which a large part of the commerce arising in the Mississippi Valley territory should find its way to the high seas.

We believe now, since the Panama Canal has been completed, a permanent channel of not less than 9 feet should be maintained, at least from the Gulf to St. Louis. Personally I want to see the old boat landings restored in my district on the Mississippi. I want to see the boat lines return to the Mississippi River, that it may be allowed to take its place as a natural artery of commerce, and thus serve the purpose of its creation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

By unanimous consent, Mr. RHODES was granted leave to extend and revise his remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired; and the Clerk will read the bill for amendment under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $12,000,000 be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available and to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers, for the preservation and maintenance of existing river and harbor works and for the prosecution of such projects heretofore authorized as may be most desirable in the interests of commerce and navigation: Provided, That $5,000,000 of the sum herein appropriated may be allotted for the preservation and maintenance of existing river and harbor works, and $7,000,000 of the sum herein appropriated may be allotted for the prosecution of works of improvement heretofore authorized by Congress: Provided further, That allotments from the amount hereby appropriated shall be made by the Secretary of War upon the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers: And provided further, That at the beginning of the third session of the Sixty-sixth Congress a special report shall be made to Congress by the Secretary of War showing the amount allotted under this appropriation for each work for improvement or maintenance.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word and ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, in the first place I wish to congratulate the Committee on Rivers and Harbors upon the wisdom of their conclusions. I think this is the cleanest river and harbor bill that has ever been reported to the House during my membership in it, and I am in a position to congratulate not only the distinguished chairman of the committee but every member of the committee on the patriotism which prompted them in doing the thing which the country expects to have done. [Applause.] They deserve not only the confidence of the American people but they will receive the plaudits of the people for having had the courage to do the right thing. There is no bill that offers greater temptation for extravagance in appropriation than this particular bill, and the committee that has had the courage to withstand such temptations has proved its qualifications and its right to the confidence of the American people. I am proud to be permitted to stand here today and say this much for these great men on this wonderful committee. I have been against the "pork-barrel" schemes provided in past river and harbor bills, but I can vote for this bill with a clear conscience, because I know that there is no waste in it, and at the same time I am sure that it provides adequately for every need of commerce.

Here we have an appropriation proposed of $12,000,000, $5,000,000 of which shall be expended for maintenance and $7,000,000 for the prosecution of existing projects. The average annual expenditure for the last five years for river and harbor improvements has been $15,000,000. If the $12,000,000 carried in this bill was all that is available for river and harbor work, I still believe it would be adequate to meet every pressing need, but it is not all, for there are $25,000,000 available——

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. RHODES. What does the gentleman mean by "pressing needs," as referred to in his remarks?

Mr. MADDEN. I mean the needs of navigation, of commerce, as proposed to be improved and provided for by the appropriations through the river and harbor bill. We have $25,000,000 available to the credit of existing projects against which there is no contract obligation. That is in the Treasury. That can be added to the $12,000,000 provided for in this bill. That would make $37,000,000, and in addition to that there are $27,000,000 more available in the Treasury to the credit of existing river and harbor projects. That makes $64,000,000 in all. Does anyone believe they can spend $64,000,000 for river and harbor work during the period embraced between this hour and March 4, 1921? Of course they can not.

It has been said that we leave the matter in a state of doubt as to where the $12,000,000 will be expended, because we have left it in the discretion of the Engineer Board as to where it will be used. There is no doubt as to what disposition will be made of this money. To the extent that may be necessary it will be allotted to projects which have moneys in the Treasury standing to their credit not sufficient to meet the existing needs, and every project will be permitted to go forward without any interruption to the progress of the work which we have now in hand. It is also said that this small appropriation will retard commerce on the interior waterways. When did it happen that there was any commerce on most of the interior waterways, for which appropriations have been heretofore made? Take the Missouri River project, about which the gentleman from Kansas City, Mr. BLAND of Missouri, descanted eloquently the other day. When was there a ton of commerce on the Missouri River——

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I decline to yield. The gentleman refused to yield to me. We have spent $8,000,000 for the so-called improvement of the Missouri River. The trouble with the Missouri River is that its banks are not in the same State two days in succession. We never know where it is. It is floating first in one State and then in another, but you may be sure that there is no commerce on it wherever it floats. The only commerce the Missouri River carries is the commerce that comes out of the United States Treasury in the form of appropriations.

We have other projects concerning which fear has been expressed that in some of these you will have to sink artesian wells to supply them with water, and yet we find appropriations to accommodate the commerce that floats down these wonderful streams. I say to you, men of this House, that the passage of this bill in its present form will do more to stabilize the improvements of rivers and harbors that are worthy of improvement than any other act that has ever been passed. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended one minute, in order that he may answer a question.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the section which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DENISON moves to strike out the first section after the enacting clause and substitute therefor the following, commencing with line 3:

"That the sum of $12,000,000 be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available and to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers, for the preservation and maintenance of existing river and harbor works, and for the prosecution of such projects heretofore authorized as may be most desirable in the interests of commerce and navigation.

"The sum of $4,000,000 is hereby appropriated for continuing the improvement of the Mississippi River from the mouth of the Ohio River to the mouth of the Missouri River, with a view to securing a permanent 8-foot channel.

"That there is hereby appropriated the sum of $3,000,000 for continuing the improvement of the Missouri River from Kansas City, Kans., from the Quindaro Bend to the mouth of the Missouri, with a view to securing a permanent 6-foot channel.

"That there is hereby appropriated the sum of $2,000,000 for continuing the improvement of the Mississippi River between the mouth of the Missouri River and Minneapolis, with a view to securing a permanent 6-foot channel.

"That there is hereby appropriated the sum of $2,000,000 for continuing the improvements of the Ohio River by the construction of locks and dams, with the view to securing a permanent 9-foot channel from Pittsburgh to Cairo.

"Provided, however, That out of the general appropriation of $12,000,000 herein appropriated the sum of $5,000,000 may be allotted for the preservation and maintenance of existing river and harbor works, and $7,000,000 of said sum of $12,000,000 herein appropriated may be allotted for the prosecution of works of improvement heretofore authorized by Congress.

"Provided further, That allotments out of said general fund of $12,000,000 shall be made by the Secretary of War upon the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers; and

"Provided further, That at the beginning of the third session of the Sixty-sixth Congress a special report shall be made to Congress by the Secretary of War showing the amounts allotted under said appropriation for each work for improvement and maintenance."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, if the amendment is not in order I would be glad to have the gentleman show it now. I do not want to take up the time of the House in talking on something that is not in order. My only purpose is to get these appropriations so as to continue river and harbor work.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, are we under the five-minute rule now?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. I would be glad if my friend from Massachusetts would state his point of order.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane and not in order on this bill, which provides for a lump-sum appropriation. It proposes to make specific appropriations for specific, definite objects, and of course the gentleman should know that it is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] on the point of order.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Illinois is called upon to show that his amendment is within the rules. The point of order has been raised, and I have some citations I wish to offer.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts claims the amendment is not in order. I think it ought to be up to the gentleman from Massachusetts to state to the Chairman and the members of the committee the reason why it is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman is not required to discuss the point of order. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] has stated the point of order, and has stated the grounds upon which he makes the point of order. The Chair thinks that is sufficient. It is optional with the gentleman himself whether he discusses it further or not.

Mr. DENISON. Very well. All I have to say, Mr. Chairman, is this: I did not anticipate a point of order was going to be made against the amendment, therefore I do not have the precedents at hand and have not looked them up, and have had no opportunity to do so. I confess that I do not know what the parliamentary rule is, but in one provision of the bill before us $12,000,000 is to be expended in the discretion of the Chief of Engineers, and in other provisions of the bill it appropriates $4,000,000 to be expended on various projects.

Mr. SEARS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. SEARS. I notice this bill is a bill—

making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

It makes this specific. Can you show me in the section which has just been read any specific appropriation for certain works? In other words, this bill does not follow the title of the bill. Your amendment, as offered, seems to follow the title of the bill, making certain specific appropriations.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield for a question?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. I would like to make a parliamentary inquiry. Just what rule is it that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] thinks that this does not fall within? If this is outside of the rule, what rules does it violate?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Massachusetts stated that this amendment was not germane to the section under consideration.

Mr. LITTLE. Of course, anybody can say that. But it was suggested that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] ought to state how it fell within the rule. Now, my inquiry is, What rule was it that the gentleman from Massachusetts claims it does not come within? That is the point. Unless there is such a rule, of course, it is not tenable.

Mr. DENISON. I understand the point the gentleman from Massachusetts makes is that the amendment is not germane to the bill; that the bill makes a lump-sum appropriation, and an amendment that is not germane to the bill is not within the rule. That is the rule, I understand, he is invoking—the rule of germaneness.

Mr. LITTLE. If there is some rule that shows it is not germane, will somebody state what it is?

Mr. DENISON. I have asked that to be done. The gentleman declines to do so, and I can not make him do so. But I think, Mr. Chairman, where there is a general appropriation, a general lump-sum appropriation, to do work on the various projects in the discretion of the Chief of Engineers, that certainly it is germane to that proposition for the House to say where part of that money shall be expended.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DENISON. I think it is germane. The other provisions of the bill specify the projects that part of this money is to be expended for, and I think my amendment is germane to the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. As a general rule, I have a good deal of respect for any parliamentary proposition advocated by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], but it seems to me that the point of order he has raised against this amendment is not tenable.

Now, the title of this bill is:

Making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Well, now, the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] falls within that language. There is not any question about it on the face of the earth.

The Committee on Rivers and Harbors elected to do a very bad thing, namely, to make a lump-sum appropriation, which is always bad and has been declared bad by every prominent man in this House from first to last, about some bill or another. I have heard the lump-sum business condemned here in ferocious manner time and time again, and I have heard the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] do that thing in the House a great many times, and he always does everything with a good deal of vehemence, and consequently always gets a hearing. I always listen to him in order to get the extreme view on his side of the case. And here comes a lump-sum proposition continuing the appropriation for improvement, repair, and so forth, of rivers and harbors. The lump sum is not the principle involved in this bill; it is not the subject of the bill. The appropriation to improve and take care of rivers and harbors is the essence of this bill. Well, now, all that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] does is to try to improve on the scheme of the committee, and it is about rivers and harbors; it is the very same subject matter of the bill.

Now, if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] wants to beat this amendment by a vote, that is a horse of a different color; but I do not think he can make his contention good that this is not germane to this bill, because it is the same subject exactly. Well, now, all that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois does is to try to improve on the scheme of the committee, and it is about rivers and harbors, it is not about appropriations for rivers and harbors—the very same subject matter of the bill. Now, if the gentleman from Massachusetts wants to beat this amendment on a vote, that is a horse of a different color; but I do not think he could make his contention good that this is not germane to the bill, because it is the same subject exactly.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, of course the title of any bill is not controlling in discussing it, considering it, or amending it. It is only taken into consideration in connection with the entire text of a measure in passing upon legislation or points of order that may be raised. But, as the Chair will note, the sum of $12,000,000 is intended to be appropriated by the first section, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War and under the supervision of the Chief of Engineers for the preservation and maintenance of existing river and harbor work, for the prosecution of projects heretofore authorized that may be most desirable in the interest of commerce and navigation. And now the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] offers an amendment which appropriates $4,000,000 to continue the improvement of the Mississippi River from certain points to certain other points; $3,000,000 for continuing the improvement of the Missouri River between such points; $2,000,000 for the improvement of the Mississippi River between the mouth of the Missouri and Minneapolis, with a view to securing a permanent 6-foot channel; $2,000,000 for continuing the improvement of the Ohio River by the construction of locks and dams, and then there are certain provisos to his amendment.

Now that is an amendment containing definite, specific projects, stating where the money shall be spent and the amount of money appropriated for each of the projects specified. But the bill appropriates a general sum to be expended by the Secretary of War, in his discretion, through the Chief of Engineers. It makes a general appropriation, and it is for a general plan of improvement, restricted to the discretion of the Engineer Department under the Secretary of War. I submit that it can not be held that it is germane on such a question as that to offer an amendment appropriating money for specific objects. The precedent has been cited under the rule relating to germaneness, and for the sake of the RECORD and for the information of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE], who inquired as to the rule—and who certainly is entitled to know the rule under which the point is made—I would state that it is paragraph 7 of rule 16, which is:

No motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment.

The Chair held in a previous case, of March 1, 1890, first session, Fifty-first Congress, that to a provision authorizing a class of employees in the public service an amendment providing for the employment of a specific individual was not germane. That is on page 4343, volume 5 of Hinds' Precedents, section 5848. A point of order was made against an amendment providing for a specific individual, and the Chair sustained the point of order, even though that individual was in the same class of employees as was provided for in the legislation under consideration, which at that time happened to be a resolution.

Now, I submit, Mr. Chairman, that here we have appropriated a general fund for a general purpose, to be expended in a way indicated in the paragraph as reported by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and I submit that it is not in order to amend that general provision by specific propositions of this sort, setting forth definite sums for the purpose.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. KITCHIN. Instead of the bill reading as it does, suppose it read, "The sum appropriated herein to be expended on works heretofore authorized by Congress," setting out specifically under the 40 or 50 different river and harbor projects theretofore authorized, then would the gentleman say that this amendment would be out of order?

Mr. WALSH. No.

Mr. KITCHIN. Then is it not elemental that when a bill refers to a particular part of an act, as this bill does, for example, the words "heretofore authorized by Congress," its effect is to include the different projects "heretofore authorized" the same as if the bill had specified those projects?

Mr. WALSH. No. The difference, if the gentleman will permit, is that in former cases where they enumerate the objects they are setting forth a number of specific objects for which the appropriations are made. Of course the rule is plain that when you provide for the admission of two Territories, you can amend by adding another, and so forth. But where you establish a general class, which is not made by specifying the various objects and enumerating the appropriations, you are establishing then nothing but a general class, and that general class can not be enlarged by adding on to it specific objects.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman's amendment is not a general class. It is a specific class included in the general class named in the act itself. It is a specific class, each one of the objects being named in the act to which this bill refers. If there were no acts already on the statute books, if there were no projects already on the statute books, then the language of the bill would be meaningless. But there is an act specifying each and every one of the projects incorporated in the gentleman's amendment, and this bill refers to them. The engineers have no authority to spend a dollar of that $7,000,000 except on the projects mentioned in the act, which includes the projects embraced in the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. WALSH. I do not think the gentleman's contention is sound in that respect, because the gentleman's amendment provides for $4,000,000 for the Mississippi, $3,000,000 for the Missouri, $2,000,000 for a 6-foot channel in the Mississippi, and $2,000,000 for a 9-foot channel and locks in the Ohio River; and certainly those projects provided in that amendment are specific projects, which he seeks to add to a general class of projects that are reported by the committee.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. It does not add any projects. It simply specifies those that are provided for in the bill.

Mr. WALSH. It does add projects, because the projects provided for in the bill are not set forth particularly. They are included in a general class, and necessarily they need not receive any of the appropriations provided for, which are to be expended in the discretion of the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I will state to the gentleman that all the projects included here have heretofore been appropriated for by Congress, and each is subject to that $7,000,000. Is it not proper to increase the appropriation for any part of the river that is subject to the benefit of that amount?

Mr. WALSH. That does not make any difference, that they have heretofore been authorized. The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] seeks to attach to this bill a principle which is directly opposite to that reported by the committee; that is to say, that they abandon the principle that the committee followed in reporting this bill as a general class, and he seeks to attach to it certain specific projects which may or may not be within that class. But even if they are within that class, it is not germane to single them out of that class and then to attach them to the bill by way of an amendment.

The provision of the rule has heretofore been invoked in the case of a tariff bill when they have had a tariff bill under consideration, and a motion to recommit was made, with a provision for the creation of a tariff commission, and the distinguished gentleman from Missouri, former Speaker CLARK, ruled that that was not germane, that it was not in order on a motion to recommit, and it went out.

Now, there was a general tariff law which had been reported and had been read a third time, and this motion to recommit was made to add on a specific provision having to do with the tariff, germane in many of its aspects, to create a separate board to administer some of the provisions of the very tariff act then under consideration, and yet that was held to be not germane.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I am very much interested in the decision of this point. Would the gentleman hold that if the appropriation was not increased, this House now has no power to distribute this lump-sum appropriation to the particular works that have been authorized previously by Congress?

Mr. WALSH. I am not making any contention on that point at all, I would say to the gentleman. Of course I am not invoking the Holman rule, or anything of that sort. I am simply saying that this amendment offered here to this section of the bill is not germane, because the principle which the section seeks to establish, which has been followed by the committee, is to provide for a class of work.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be glad to have the gentleman from Massachusetts state for the information of the Chair what the gentleman from Massachusetts considers to be the subject of section 1 of the bill.

Mr. WALSH. The subject of section 1 of the bill, Mr. Chairman, is an appropriation of $12,000,000 to be expended by the Secretary of War through the Chief of Engineers, in his discretion, for the maintenance of existing river and harbor work and the prosecution of such projects heretofore authorized as may be most desirable in the interest of commerce and navigation. I submit that it is not germane to say that that $12,000,000 by an amendment shall be expended on one existing project heretofore authorized, or on two existing projects heretofore authorized, because you are making a specific appropriation by way of amendment to a general class of legislation as reported by the committee.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a further point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order additional to that made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], that the amendment must not only be germane to the subject matter of the bill, but it must be germane to the particular section to which it is offered; and I make the point of order that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] is not germane to section 1, because in that section every dollar appropriated is required to be expended, if expended at all, upon the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, and only in that way. That was the purpose and intent of the committee in reporting out the bill, that no public money should be expended on rivers and harbors just now except upon the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, while the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois seeks to get around that provision, seeks to take it outside of that limitation, and to permit a certain amount—not the amount provided for in the bill, but additional to it—to be expended, not upon the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, but in a specific way determined by the House antagonistic to the purpose and intent of the committee reporting out the bill.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I want to make this additional observation: Of course there is nothing to the point made by the gentleman from Texas. He construes the essence of section 1 to be to give discretion to the Chief of Engineers, and says that therefore any amendment that would take away the discretion from the Chief of Engineers would not be germane. Of course, the giving of the right to the Chief of Engineers to exercise his discretion is a mere incident and is not the purpose or essence of section 1. The chairman suggested the real, essential purpose here. What is the committee seeking to do in section 1? What is the essence of it? The essence of it is stated plainly—for the preservation, maintenance, and repair of existing river and harbor work, and for the prosecution of such projects heretofore authorized as may be most desirable in the interest of commerce and navigation.

Now, section 1 does divide that blanket appropriation up into two provisions, $5,000,000 of which will be devoted to one purpose and $7,000,000 to another.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say that the decision of the Chair is going to be of a good deal of consequence, because if this is held not to be germane then hereafter any committee can come in with a blanket lump-sum appropriation for any project or for the use of any department of the Government and the House of Representatives will have its hands tied and can not say by amendment for what purpose the money shall be expended, under the pretense that it is not germane, when the purpose of the amendment would specifically carry out the very purpose stated in the bill. It seems to me that would be carrying the rule of germaneness entirely too far and would establish a very dangerous precedent.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, as I understand it, is this: In the first place, it is a substitute for section 1, and the substitute proposes to appropriate $12,000,000 and divides it up—$5,000,000 for maintenance and $7,000,000 for further improvement, just as the existing section of the pending bill does. It further appropriates specifically $4,000,000 for the Mississippi River between the mouth of the Ohio and Missouri Rivers, $3,000,000 for the Missouri from Kansas City to the mouth, $2,000,000 for the Mississippi River from the mouth of the Missouri up to Minneapolis, and $2,000,000 for the Ohio River. That is in addition to the $12,000,000.

In other words, the proposed substitute for section 1 appropriates $12,000,000, just as section 1 does, to be divided—$5,000,000 for maintenance and $7,000,000 for further improvements—and in addition to that appropriates specific sums for the Mississippi, Missouri, and Ohio Rivers. That is the way I interpreted the amendment as I heard it and as I read it hurriedly afterwards.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] makes the point of order that it is not germane, and bases his point upon the contention that section 1 in the pending bill simply makes a lump-sum appropriation without attempting to specify how the items shall be expended, and that therefore this amendment is not germane and not in order because it does attempt to specify as to three rivers in the country.

Mr. Chairman, in my opinion the point of order is absolutely untenable. But before giving my reasons for it I want to be frank and say that I am not in favor of the amendment, because it violates the well-settled policy of the committee which has been in force for many years in making appropriations, and I shall have later a motion to recommit this bill and to insert a substitute for section 1 which will entirely conform to the policy of the committee, and which, by the way, is printed on page 1789, January 20, and which I hope to discuss while this bill is under consideration under the five-minute rule.

Now, I wish at this moment to present my views to the effect that the point of order is not tenable. The gentleman says the amendment is not germane because it attempts to make three specific appropriations for three rivers. Why, Mr. Chairman, section 1 of the pending bill makes appropriations for the maintenance and further improvement of every river and harbor in the United States, and leaves it to the Chief of Engineers to select where it shall be expended; so that the pending section, although it is a lump-sum appropriation in its expenditure, instead of being designated by Congress, leaves it to the Chief of Engineers to designate, and in effect constitutes an appropriation for the maintenance and further improvement of a number of projects throughout the country.

Therefore the contention that this amendment is not germane because it makes appropriations for three rivers in the United States can not be sustained, because, as I said, this $12,000,000 appropriation carried in the first section of the pending bill appropriates for numerous projects specified in the report, but, instead of Congress selecting the projects upon which the appropriation is to be expended, it directs the Secretary of War, under the supervision of the Chief of Engineers, to make the selection where it shall be expended. So that section 1 of the bill does appropriate for various improvements, both for maintenance and for further improvement, and the point of order upon that ground, it seems to me, must fall and can not be sustained.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the making of points of order on the subject of germaneness, like the writing of many books, seems to be without end. In connection with points of order of this character, it may be noted that it is not difficult to find in the great mass of House precedents on this subject some precedent to support almost any contention that may be advanced.

The main proposition involved in the pending point of order is one of the power of the House. Is it competent for an appropriating committee to bring into this body a bill carrying a lump-sum appropriation which is to be expended according to directions contained in the bill, and thereby exclude the House from providing a different system of expenditure dealing with a larger appropriation for precisely the same objects? I wish to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the money provided in the bill may be expended by the Secretary of War upon the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers upon precisely the same projects that are described in the Denison amendment. In both cases the works of improvement are works heretofore authorized by Congress.

The gentleman from Massachusetts says, in substance, that when one method of dealing with a subject matter is before the committee, and under consideration, it is not competent to substitute therefor by amendment a larger appropriation and a different application in detail of the same without impinging upon the principle of germaneness. That is too broad a contention. One plan may be replaced by another plan of a very different character, but the second plan may be open to amendment that is germane to the first. A germane amendment may totally alter a pending proposition. Of course it may be freely conceded that the principle of germaneness may be so enlarged in application as to admit anything in the way of an amendment. That is not desirable. On the other hand, it may be so strictly construed as to prejudicially restrict the power of the House or committee to perfect pending legislation by appropriate amendments, and thereby bring about a still more undesirable situation. There is no precise mathematical standard to which you can appeal to determine whether an amendment is germane. A large common sense must be used in the application of the rule of germaneness to a proposed amendment. The principle is a wholesome one, and readily stated, while its application is often very difficult. It is impossible to bring many amendments within the terms of any express precedent. On the one hand is the Scylla of too loose an application, on the other the Charybdis of too rigid and technical application. Both are equally undesirable, and between the two the presiding officer must hold a middle course. I maintain that the rule of germaneness should be liberally, not narrowly construed. Even in the former view there will be many amendments that will be clearly out of order.

I desire to call the attention of the Chair to two or three precedents in this connection, showing how a different proposition from the one under consideration has been admitted by amendment.

Some years ago a bill was before the House for the construction of an interoceanic canal. This bill provided for a canal by a specified route. An amendment providing for another route was held to be germane. The kinship in this matter was that both the bill and amendment related to a canal to connect the Pacific and Atlantic Oceans. Hence the amendment was in order, though the routes were entirely different.

According to the contention of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], the ruling admitting the amendment was erroneous. A proposition of a certain definite character was before the House. It dealt with an interoceanic canal by a specified route. If the present contention of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is sound, upon what principle was the amendment providing for a canal by an entirely different route germane and in order? See Hinds, Volume V, section 5909. Some other precedents may be appropriately cited.

To a bill relating to the salaries of judges of the United States an amendment relating to salaries of the judges in Porto Rico was held to be germane. See Hinds, Volume V, 5913.

This bill dealt with one class of judges, the judges of the United States and of the District of Columbia, yet an amendment bringing in the judges of a totally different locality was held to be germane. A narrow application of the rule of germaneness would have excluded the latter judges. There was nothing in the bill before the House relating to Porto Rico. The bill was intended for the judges of continental United States. Obviously the Chair took the view that as the bill fundamentally dealt with the salaries of judges, there was kinship between the general purpose of the bill and an amendment bringing in other judges within the authority of the Federal Government.

Permit me to give the Chair another and even stronger illustration: To a bill providing for a union station in the District of Columbia an amendment levying a special tax on the District to defray the cost of that station was held to be germane. Hinds, Volume V, section 5916. If the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is right in his contention, upon what possible view was that amendment held to be germane?

The subject matter before the House was the establishment of a union station in the District of Columbia. The proposition to tax the District of Columbia was not presented in the bill, directly or indirectly. Yet an amendment providing for a tax upon the District of Columbia to pay for the station proposed to be established was held to be germane. Evidently the Chair considered that as the subject matter was the establishment of the station, a plan for paying for the same was germane and in order, and not to be excluded merely because the terms of the bill related only to the location of the station in the District, and in no wise undertook to pay for the same.

Still another citation.

To a provision providing clerks for Members of one House, an amendment providing clerks for Members of the Senate has been held to be germane. Hinds, Volume V, section 5899. Upon what principle could that ruling be sustained, save by a liberal interpretation of the rule of germaneness? The one subject matter of the bill was clerks for one branch of Congress. The bill was designed to deal only with the clerks of this body, and was limited in express terms to the clerks of this body, yet an amendment which provided clerks for the Members of the other body was held to be germane. It is perfectly competent to transform by amendment a pending proposition.

This bill provides an appropriation of $7,000,000 for the prosecution of works of improvement heretofore authorized by Congress. These projects are numerous, and conceivably this appropriation may be so applied by the distributing authority provided in the bill that every project now in progress may receive a portion of the fund. This is the exact language of the bill:

Seven million dollars of the sum herein appropriated may be allotted for the prosecution of works of improvement heretofore authorized by Congress.

In other words, every work of improvement heretofore authorized by Congress may, as stated heretofore, receive a portion of this fund. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] offers an amendment enlarging the fund. He denominates certain selected projects heretofore appropriated for, and authorized, and provides by his amendment specifically what amounts shall be applied to these projects. That is carrying forward the work of internal improvement and the plan proposed by the amendment is germane to the bill. It deals with the same subject matters provided for in the bill, but in a different way, and conceivably a better way. The plan of the amendment is in harmony with the general purposes announced in the title of the bill. It merely reduces the discretion of the Chief of Engineers by providing a fixed amount for certain projects. The amendment relates to rivers and harbors and their development, and is certainly germane to the scheme of the bill by providing another and different plan of dealing with the same subject matters.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Suppose the Chair should follow the gentleman's argument and should hold with him that the point of order is not good; then, beginning with to-morrow, there would be another precedent found in the RECORD for upholding the gentleman's position on the subject of germaneness.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. If my position is correct, it should be sustained.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman's position is incorrect, the precedent should not be established by following it.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. But if my position is correct, then by sustaining it, the Chair will merely add another to a long line of well-established precedents. I do not catch the gentleman's point.

Mr. BLANTON. Because former Chairmen may have been making improper rulings.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That may be true, but the rulings that I have cited are well sustained and conform to sound principle. I maintain that they are proper rulings.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. This is a bill appropriating money for the improvement of rivers and harbors. Section 1 of the bill provides for a lump-sum appropriation to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] offers an amendment to the section by way of substitute incorporating a lump-sum provision and also providing for certain specific appropriations. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] makes the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the section of the bill. It is true that certain circumstances might suggest that the purpose of the amendment is to defeat the purpose of the first section. The method proposed by the first section is one way of expending the money provided. The gentleman from Illinois proposes another way of doing it, and he also provides appropriations for certain improvements that fall within the class for which the lump-sum appropriation is made.

The general rule is that specific provisions can be made qualifying a general provision in a bill. The Chair holds that the section under consideration is an appropriation for the improvement of rivers and harbors generally and for the continuation of certain projects, and it seems to the Chair that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois is germane not only to the subject of the bill itself but also to the subject under consideration; and the Chair therefore overrules the point of order and recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON].

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BACHARACH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution (S. J. Res. 134) to readmit Augusta Louise de Haven-Alten to the status and privileges of a citizen of the United States, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, the day before yesterday the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], and this morning my colleague [Mr. MADDEN], took considerable time complimenting the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and denominating that committee as one of the greatest committees of the House and the chairman of it as a great chairman. The gentleman from Wyoming and my colleague from Illinois are addressing these remarks to the committee because in this instance, apparently, the committee bowed to their judgment and has done what they have wanted done. But this great River and Harbor Committee will come in next year with another river and harbor bill, and the year after that with another bill, and in the years to come with other river and harbor bills. Neither of those gentlemen has a higher opinion of the River and Harbor Committee and its chairman than I, but my opinion about that committee and its chairman is not based upon their action this year, but their conduct of the business during a course of years. I shall await with interest to see the attitude my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] take the next year and the year after when the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENNEDY] brings in a real river and harbor appropriation bill for the improvement of rivers and harbors.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. Does not the gentleman recognize the difference between now and next year, possibly, and the year after?

Mr. DENISON. I recognize the difference in some respects in conditions, but I do not recognize any difference in principles involved in the development of water transportation. Next year and the year after I hope the River and Harbor Committee will come in with a real river and harbor appropriation bill, and then I am anxious to see whether or not my colleague from Illinois and the gentleman from Wyoming will come in and continue their laudatory observations about this committee. Gentlemen, there will be no more blanket appropriations from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. The House of Representatives is not going to stand for lump-sum appropriations. They are wrong in principle, and the Members on both sides of the House have denounced them, and to-day in opposing them in this bill I am simply following the better judgment of the Members of the House of Representatives heretofore. I am not in favor of abdicating the functions of Congress in favor of any Chief of Engineers or of the chief of any other bureau or division of the Government.

Mr. Chairman, the State of Illinois has voted a bond issue of $20,000,000 for the purpose of deepening the channel between Lake Michigan and the Mississippi River, so as to make a channel for the transportation of commerce by water from the Lakes to the Gulf, and if this bill passes in the form in which it is reported the action of the State of Illinois will have to be suspended in my judgment. The State of Illinois can not afford to expend its $20,000,000, in addition to the $100,000,000 that have already been expended on that waterway by the State of Illinois, making the channel from Lake Michigan to the Illinois River, when we are stopping the work on the Mississippi River between St. Louis and Cairo, which is the key to the entire Mississippi and Missouri Valleys. There is a stretch between the mouth of the Missouri River and Cairo where there is great need of the expenditure of money to make an 8-foot clear channel for the commerce of the upper Mississippi River and the Missouri River and the Illinois River to the Lakes, if we complete that channel; and now, if we abandon that, which we are doing if we pass this bill, we will be wasting a great deal of money that has heretofore been expended in the improvement of the upper Mississippi, the Missouri, and the Illinois Rivers. I hope that the Congress, notwithstanding the great need for economy, will not adopt a policy this year that will not only stop the work of improvement of these channels but will waste a great deal of money that has already been expended there.

If you are going to build a house, no business man would say that he would expend just $1,000 on the foundation or on the framework and let the house go until some other year. You would be wasting money in doing that, and the appropriation of $12,000,000 to the Chief of Engineers for the improvement of rivers and harbors is a mere waste. If you are not going to make any appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors, I think the economic and wise policy would be to strike out the $12,000,000 entirely. The $12,000,000 is not going to do anything in the way of improving rivers and harbors, and if you are going to attempt to economize to the extent done by this bill, you had better go ahead and defeat the entire bill, and thereby you may save $12,000,000 more. The Government has been expending money in the construction of barges, and what for? To begin water transportation and encourage the investment of private capital in the operation of water transportation. If we stop the work of improving the channels, the money we have expended in the construction of barges for the Mississippi River will practically have been lost.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Of course, the gentleman knows that the engineers have made no such recommendations for expenditures for the next fiscal year as are contemplated in the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. DENISON. I understand that they have stated that they need practically that amount of money. If I have not got it exactly right in dollars and cents I will be glad to have the gentleman from Iowa suggest the correct amount, and I will insert it in my amendment. What I am trying to do is to get enough money to go ahead with the necessary work.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. The engineers say that the Missouri can be left out without any appropriation.

Mr. DYER. What about the Mississippi River?

Mr. DENISON. I want to say this to the chairman of the committee: I have been interested in the development of river transportation since I have been a Member of Congress. I have been in the office of the engineers that have charge of that part of the Mississippi River from St. Louis to Cairo a number of times, and I was in their office not over three weeks ago. Every time I have been there to see them about getting river work for the improvement of the channel, their invariable answer is that they have not the funds to do it, and why does not Congress "give us the funds?" When we go to the engineers' office to get work done, they say give us the funds to do it, and when the committee brings the bill in here somebody gets up and says that they have a great deal more than they can use. Some one is wrong. I was in the engineers' office not over three weeks ago, and they told me they could not do any better work of correcting the channel along that part of the river with the appropriations that they had. We should either appropriate enough money to complete the work of providing a permanent navigable channel in that part of the river or we should abandon the work entirely.

Now, what I want to do is to go ahead with this great work that Congress has approved for a great many years and develop water transportation in the Missisippi Valley.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

Mr. WALSH. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes on the amendment strictly.

Mr. DYER. I object. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] could not have an extension of five minutes, I shall object to any gentleman having an extension.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] had 10 minutes.

Mr. FREAR. This is an $11,000,000 increase proposition, and if the people from St. Louis insist on cutting down the time, they will gain nothing by such proceeding.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. No; I will not yield.

Mr. DYER. Then do not refer to me.

Mr. FREAR. I referred directly to the gentleman who just spoke. Here is an indefensible appropriation for $11,000,000 additional appropriation, $4,000,000 for the Mississippi River and $7,000,000 for three other projects. If I wanted to kill this bill, gentlemen, I would vote for the amendment. I can not think of anything that would damn this bill more than to put through this amendment you have offered here.

I desire to oppose this amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON], which adds to the committee bill the following items: Four million dollars for the 200-mile stretch on the Mississippi between Cairo and the mouth of the Missouri; $2,000,000 for the Mississippi River from the mouth of the Missouri River to Minneapolis; $3,000,000 for the 400-mile stretch of the Missouri River from Kansas City to the Mississippi River, and $2,000,000 for the Ohio River.

This $11,000,000 is in addition to the amount required by Army engineers for the next two years' improvements and maintenance fund, which is covered by $12,000,000 contained in the committee bill. In other words the adoption of this amendment will increase the bill from $12,000,000 to $23,000,000 and show the absurdity of all claims for economy that have been made during the past few days.

Several years ago when the first fight was made against the river and harbor pork barrel, I stood practically alone in the House. I take no credit for what has been brought about after a number of contests, but bills have been defeated and others pared from $50,000,000, the amount carried in the 1913 bill, down to $12,000,000 named by the committee in this bill. Waterways should be improved by the Government where actual commerce exists, but it is folly to throw money away on worthless projects and probably no four more worthless or extravagant projects can be brought together than those covered by the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

I desire to submit a few brief comparisons that speak for themselves, and they disclose that apart from fabulous expenditures in the past of over $100,000,000 on these four river projects the entire commerce, aside from coal carried a few miles on the Ohio River, is not 10 per cent of any one of a half dozen lake harbors. Commerce is so small on these rivers that only by giving the figures can the waste of public money be appreciated. Before one dollar of the $100,000,000 was spent on the three rivers, and another $100,000,000 on the lower Mississippi, the waterways were covered with boats. Now, they are almost deserted, apart from a small short-haul coal traffic on the Ohio.

Dredgers and contractors are continually boosting waterway associations, but practically every dollar of the $30,000,000 more asked for on the 200 miles of the Mississippi from Cairo to the Missouri is for revetment and diking to protect private property. The same is true of the Missouri River expenditures by the Government. Private property along these rivers is being protected or reclaimed at public expense. The startling fact remains that after squandering the major part of $200,000,000 on the Ohio, Mississippi, and Missouri Rivers commerce is insignificant, while the reclamation projects have been a constant burden on the Government, and we have practically nothing of real value to navigation to show for our money. Great locks and dams and many miles of revetments will not bring commerce as long as the railways continue to drive freight from the river by cut-throat "water competition" freight rates. It is folly to expect it.

COST OF AN INSIGNIFICANT COMMERCE.

Mr. Chairman, here are a few comparisons that tell their own story. The Mississippi River and Ashland Harbor amendment to add $4,000,000 for the following project, Mississippi River, Cairo to mouth of the Missouri, 200 miles:

Past appropriations (p. 1226, 1919 report)	$19,166,599
Past expenditures (p. 1226, 1919 report)	18,503,764
Balance July 1, 1919	619,767

Cost to complete project, $31,010,000, or $50,000,000 in all for a 200-mile stretch of river.

How $14,000,000 has been expended on this 200 miles (p. 1224): The Government built 357,000 feet of bank revetment, or 70 miles, and 402,000 feet piling dikes, or 80 miles, at cost of $14,000,000. Of the work there is now in good condition (p. 1226):

270,000 feet revetment, or one-fourth, has been destroyed, loss $25 per foot	$6,000,000
240,000 feet dikes, or 40 per cent, has been destroyed, loss $25 per foot	8,000,000
Total loss	14,000,000

In other words, the loss due to increasing cost equals past expenditures:

To be built or restored:
866,000 feet revetment, or 175 miles, at $25 per foot	$21,650,000
286,000 feet dikes, or 55 miles, at $35 per foot	10,010,000
	31,660,000

Due from Edward F. Goltra $14,780 for barge rental (p. 2822); no local cooperation in recent years (note, p. 1226); $350,000 regular maintenance annually.

Commerce, 1918 (p. 2818), 264,149 tons, of which:
Garbage	tons	34,775
Logs	do	27,690

This small commerce was possible after the Government had built and leased 20 steel barges that carried 47,000 tons of ore.

REAL WATERWAY COMMERCE.

Harbor of Ashland, Wis., cost and commerce: Total appropriation, $650,500 (p. 3169); commerce, 9,361,221 tons. Haul average, 800 miles.

Ashland improvement cost about 4 per cent of this 200-mile Mississippi project. Commerce of Ashland is 40 times as great, including St. Louis garbage, logs, etc., and the haul 8 times as far.

Again the Denison amendment asks $2,000,000 for the following project: Mississippi River from mouth of Missouri River to Minneapolis, 664 miles; appropriations, $31,230,200 (p. 2851); commerce (1918), 157,471 tons. Average haul, 59.6 miles.

Compared with cost and commerce of Buffalo harbor (p. 3350), year 1918: Appropriations, $6,795,450 (p. 3350); commerce (1918), 19,163,259 tons (p. 3349); Buffalo appropriations are about 22 per cent of those of the upper Mississippi. Buffalo harbor commerce is more than one hundred times as great as that of the upper Mississippi.

The engineers say of the upper Mississippi River:

There is no hope of a prosperous river business on the upper Mississippi until adequate terminal and transfer facilities connecting with railroads are provided and also suitable tow boats and barges (p. 2847).

Although $31,230,200 have been appropriated for the upper Mississippi River, not a single boat line runs on the river from St. Paul to St. Louis excepting for short distances, and the small commerce is shown to be 157,471 tons of coal, merchandise, and so forth, hauled about 60 miles on the average over a stretch of river 664 miles long or 10 per cent of the distance.

I am giving some comparisons, if you will permit, that show the absurdity of this amendment coming in the way it does.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes additional time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, the Denison amendment adds $3,000,000 for the lower Missouri River. Let me give a few figures from the last Engineers' report on this remarkable project:

Missouri River, 400 miles.

Appropriations (p. 2898)		$17,313,130
Unexpended July, 1919 (p. 1290)		$1,174,110
Commerce, 1917	tons	217,616
Commerce, 1918	do	142,981

Loss, 40 per cent in one year.

Boats sold to the Government in September, 1918, to use on the Mississippi, but traffic was continued six of the eight months of the year.

Estimates of proposed use of $2,100,000 asked for by Engineers for 1920 (p. 1288):

Revetment	$675,000
Clump dike	1,075,000
Repairs to dikes	225,000
Miscellaneous, including office expenses	125,000
Total	2,100,000

Again it appears all of this public money is to reclaim private lands or protect lands from floods and not to help navigation:

Commerce, 1918 (p. 2897)	tons	142,981
Sand and gravel hauled one-half mile	do	132,787
Miscellaneous commerce	do	10,000

Interest on an investment of $16,000,000 included, makes a cost of $90 per ton for carrying 10,000 tons of miscellaneous commerce, including wood and coal hauled 20 miles, valued at $4.50 per ton.

Expended for maintenance, 1918, $295,207 (p. 1289), or $29.50 per ton.

Comparison between Missouri River and Ashtabula Harbor (1918):

Real waterway commerce.

Missouri River appropriations (p. 2398)		$17,313,130
Missouri River commerce (p. 2897)	tons	10,000
Ashtabula Harbor appropriation (p. 3338)		$2,401,874
Ashtabula Harbor commerce (p. 3337)	tons	16,993,677

Ashtabula appropriations are about 15 per cent of those of the Missouri River.

Ashtabula commerce is 1,600 times as great.

Mr. Chairman, with $12,500,000 balance on hand July 1, 1919, for the Ohio River the Denison amendment adds $2,000,000 to the wasteful Ohio River project.

Ohio River cost and commerce.

Appropriations:
Open river (p. 3113)	$9,257,871
Locks and dams (p. 3016)	62,534,579
Total	71,792,450

Balance on hand July 1, 1919 (p. 3017), $12,555,617.

Commerce (p. 3039) year 1918, 4,571,935 tons, of which gravel was 1,020,999 tons, sand 844,830 tons, waste 50,000 tons. Total, 1,915,829 tons. One million nine hundred and fifteen thousand eight hundred and twenty-nine tons of gravel, sand and waste and 2,594,699 tons of coal hauled 20 miles; 60,407 tons miscellaneous hauled 20 miles.

Apart from coal hauled 20 miles out of the 1,000 miles of Ohio River improvement the real commerce is only about 60,000 tons on the upper stretch and a comparativey slight commerce on the entire river. Countless millions will be wasted on the Mississippi, Missouri, and Ohio in addition to a large part of $200,000,000 already squandered on these waterways before the taxpayers will demand to know what it was for.

AGAIN SOME REAL WATERWAY COMMERCE.

Superior-Duluth Harbor (1918) cost and commerce: Appropriations (p. 3166), $8,199,028; commerce (p. 3164), 53,746,358 tons, hauled 850 miles. Cost about 12 per cent of the Ohio River expenditures; commerce twelve times as great; haul forty times as far.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to say one further word. I was on the River and Harbor Committee for several years. No committee can give Members all they want for their projects. It is well that can not be done. You are on record and we are all on record in this Congress to try at this time to put through a bill that will be economical. I congratulate the chairman of the committee, because he has always stood strong on the general proposition of trying to prevent waste. He has never been afraid of the cars, and I know this committee also is deserving of credit in holding the 1920 bill down to small limits. With nearly $60,000,000 on hand and with the $12,000,000 that is carried by this bill the Army engineers will not be able to use one-quarter of the money by next year. They can not get the contractors, and they are paying to-day 40 or 50 per cent more on the dredging contracts than they have paid in the past.

Mr. DENISON. Does the gentleman think that this $60,000,000 ought to be covered back into the Treasury?

Mr. FREAR. I think it ought to be used as each particular project is improved, and that is what has to be done under the law. We have in this bill $12,000,000, of which $5,000,000 is for maintenance and $7,000,000 for new improvements. I do not think all the $7,000,000 will be used, but I believe we ought to maintain every commerce-carrying project we have got. But if the Army engineers say it is proper I am willing to submit to it at this time and hold them responsible for wasteful expenditures.

Mr. DENISON. Where does the gentleman think it ought to be expended?

Mr. FREAR. I think it ought to be used where it can be used profitably and commercially and, let me add, economically. I would stop work to-morrow on a project that is not carrying commerce. That hits the Missouri River, which is only carrying a trifling number of tons of freight to-day, outside of sand hauled half a mile. I would say to the waterway associations and other organizations that bear down on Members to get large appropriations for their pet project, "Show your own need and do your own part before the Government will keep digging into the Treasury for your projects. Build terminals and boats to carry commerce and prove the waterway is to be used." When inland waterway commerce has fallen off probably 80 per cent to 95 per cent on our largest rivers in 50 years, it is folly to ascribe such loss to lack of river improvements. This is a day for economy, when we are compelled to give an accounting for what has been expended, and it is a rash man who will undertake to defend one-half of the three hundred and odd waterway projects we are improving to-day. We ought to change the entire system and provide a high-class board of public works to take over all of our waterways. Until that is done "pork barrels" will confront us in every Congress and Members will be found urging additional appropriations for projects in their districts. We are called upon to legislate nationally, not locally, and while every Member must properly care for the legitimate needs of his constituents it is neither wise nor just to the taxpayers of the country to urge a proposal that is without merit. The projects covered by this amendment have little to recommend them to this Congress, and the amendment ought to be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. FREAR. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request.

There was no objection.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, some considerable discussion may be desired on this section. I would like to see if we could not agree on limiting the time on this section and all amendments thereto.

Mr. SMALL. What length of time would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Would 45 minutes be enough?

Mr. SMALL. On the entire bill?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. On this section.

Mr. BEE. I would like to have a few minutes.

Mr. SMALL. Forty-five minutes would not be enough, judging from the number of gentlemen over here who have indicated a desire to speak on this section.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I hope the gentlemen who wish to speak would indicate it.

Mr. SMALL. It would probably be an economy of time to let the debate run 15 or 20 minutes longer. Then we can agree, probably.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Suppose we agree on an hour, 30 minutes on a side?

Mr. SMALL. The requests are made for time on this particular section. I desire to say that I wish about 15 minutes myself.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. My only desire was to save time.

Mr. SMALL. I will cooperate with the gentleman in every way, but the gentleman will recall that there are no other sections in the bill that, so far as I can anticipate, will be likely to provoke debate.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Suppose we close the discussion on this section at half past 3.

Mr. GRIFFIN. And all amendments thereto?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. SMALL. Fifty minutes have been asked for by gentlemen around me. The gentleman from Iowa can see the number of gentlemen who wish to speak. Fifty-five minutes have been asked for outside of the 15 minutes which I have asked for.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Well, then, suppose we agree upon two hours, one hour to be controlled by the gentleman from North Carolina and the other by myself?

Mr. SMALL. If the gentleman does not wish as much time as this side, make it two hours and a half.

Mr. WALSH. No; I will object. I will make a point of order to every pro forma amendment.

Mr. SMALL. Does the gentleman wish to use more than an hour on his side?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I have requests here for about an hour.

Mr. SMALL. Let us have 1 hour and 15 minutes. Then we can accommodate these gentlemen.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Let us agree on two hours. I will move to close debate unless we can get an agreement.

Mr. SMALL. We are all willing that the bill be completed to-day and not carry it over until to-morrow.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Then we can not have a debate of more than two hours on this section.

Mr. SMALL. I do not think there will be much debate on the other sections of the bill.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I do not want to cut off debate, but I do not think we can agree on more than two hours' debate.

Mr. SEARS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, it seems that those who have already spoken on that side are the ones who are insisting on limiting the debate.

Mr. DYER. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, am I recognized?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto be limited to two hours, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] and one-half by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto be limited to two hours, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL]. Is there objection?

Mr. SMALL. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, under the peculiar conditions, I ask the gentleman from Iowa to modify his request and make it 1 hour and 15 minutes to this side, because of the unusual demand. I think that is in the interest of economy of time.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I think we should divide the time equally.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman should remember that nobody on this side has spoken on the section yet.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Oh, yes; they have. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON], the author of the amendment, has taken 10 minutes, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] has taken 10 minutes against it. The time has been equally divided.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] occupied 10 minutes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Oh, Mr. MADDEN had 10 minutes on the general bill.

Mr. SMALL. I think it is in the interest of economy of time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. SMALL. I object.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I then move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in two hours.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in two hours.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I make the point of no quorum, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and sixty-three gentlemen are present—a quorum.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers are demanded. Those who favor taking the vote by tellers will rise and stand until they are counted.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, what is the request?

The CHAIRMAN. For tellers.

Mr. WALSH. We have not voted on the original motion yet.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's point is well made. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. SMALL. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 88, noes 38.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time be equally divided between the gentleman from North Carolina and myself, he to control one half of the time and myself the other half.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the time be equally divided, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL], and the other half to be controlled by himself. Is there objection?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, may I ask what disposition that request will make of proposed amendments which Members of the House desire to offer?

Mr. DEMPSEY. They will have to offer them during the time of two hours' debate.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Does that mean we have got to get consent from either one or other of the gentlemen controlling the debate in order to offer an amendment?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I suppose so.

Mr. DYER. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I have not relinquished the floor yet, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded. The regular order is, Is there objection?

Mr. GRIFFIN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

Mr. GRIFFIN. If you are going to insist upon gag rule, all right. I object if you will not listen to reason.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SMALL. I think the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa was embodied in these motions.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Oh, no!

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, I rose to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has sought to get the recognition of the Chair. The Chair will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I desire to make this parliamentary inquiry: I understand the action of the committee was that two hours were to be given to debate and for the consideration of amendments to the section. Does that preclude the offering, the mere offering, of an amendment by anyone who may not have obtained the floor to speak within the two hours?

Mr. WALSH. No; it does not.

The CHAIRMAN. As many amendments may be offered as gentlemen desire to make.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Irrespective of the recognition of the gentleman within the two hours?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I thought so.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] withdraws his objection. I renew the unanimous-consent request of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENNEDY], that the two hours be controlled one-half by himself and one-half by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the time be equally divided, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Iowa and one-half by himself. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

Mr. GRIFFIN. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DYER. If a Member has an amendment, but is not able to get time to speak or present it, under the rules of the House is he not entitled to have his amendment presented and read at the desk and voted upon?

The CHAIRMAN. If he secures recognition for that purpose he is entitled to offer his amendment.

Mr. DYER. I make the further inquiry whether or not the Chair is not compelled to recognize a gentleman who has an amendment to offer?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. SMALL. I modify my request for unanimous consent to this extent, that any amendments offered may be read regardless of the time, and that all amendments which are ready be presented now.

Mr. DEMPSEY. That will give the gentleman from Missouri a chance.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, has the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina as to division of the time been agreed to?

Mr. CANNON. That was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. A request was made that the debate be confined to two hours. That was objected to and then a motion was made that the time be limited to two hours, and that motion was agreed to. That limits the debate on this section and all amendments thereto to two hours. Then the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] preferred the request that the time be equally divided between the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENNEDY] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL], and to that request objection was made.

Mr. CANNON. I withdraw my objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws his objection. The question is, Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. WALSH. What is the request?

The CHAIRMAN. The request is that the two hours' time which the committee has decided shall limit the debate be controlled one-half by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENNEDY] and one-half by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

Mr. WALSH. That has already been granted. What the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] objected to was the request that amendments might be offered during the time.

Mr. GRIFFIN. We do not need any consent to offer amendments. The question is not as to the offering of amendments but it is whether or not amendments that are offered may be read.

Mr. IGOE. I ask for the regular order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENNEDY].

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL].

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I fear that many of the Members who seem to be opposing this bill—the rivers and harbors bill—have lost sight of the fact that in order to run the engineering department out of money and exhaust the funds already at its disposal between this date and March, 1921, that department will have to expend somewhere in the vicinity of $64,000,000 already available in addition to the $12,000,000 that we now seek to appropriate in this bill.

I feel strongly with my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] on the subject of the Mississippi, Ohio, and Missouri River waterways. As has been stated here on this floor, the city of Chicago has expended over $80,000,000 in order to connect the Great Lakes with the Gulf. There is an unfinished stretch of 5 miles between Lockport, Ill., and Joliet, Ill., that would solve the most expensive part of the waterway problem in so far as Illinois is concerned, and years ago the city of Chicago, or, rather, the Sanitary District of Chicago, offered to pay the bill for that improvement.

I am as opposed as any Member on this floor can be to lump-sum appropriations. I do not believe that this Congress should hand over to any executive organization the matter of expending money without complete direction; but I realize that the year 1920 is different from all other years in the history of this country. We are confronted with a terrific deficit. We have piled burdens on the taxpayer under which he groans, and if there ever was a call upon the Congress of the United States to economize, that call is on us now. I, as a member of this committee, have joined the majority members of the committee in coming in here with this bill reducing a $42,000,000 estimate to a $12,000,000 appropriation, cutting off $30,000,000, and I have done that on the express statement to me by members of the steering committee that every committee of this House would be requested and expected to do exactly what we have done. We are doing a patriotic act.

Mr. IGOE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JUUL. Yes.

Mr. IGOE. I just wanted to know if all the appropriation bills are going to be on the basis of 8 months instead of 12?

Mr. JUUL. I want to say to the gentleman that I think a great number of Members are harassed with the undue fear that the works in which they are interested are going to be stopped. So I want to call attention to a few of the items for which there is money in the Treasury.

My friend from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] probably does not know, although perhaps he does, that there is for the improvement of the Mississippi River between the Ohio and the Missouri the sum of $367,573 available in addition to such share as that project will get out of the $12,000,000 which it is proposed to appropriate in this bill.

There is available in the Treasury for the Mississippi River, from the Missouri River to St. Paul, credited to that same stream, $586,875 unexpended.

There is a project very close to that, the Tennessee River, for which there is unexpended $591,215.

There is in the Tennessee River, from Chattanooga to Riverton, unexpended, $559,812.

There is to the credit of the Ohio River, unexpended, for locks and dams, $4,954,884. Those figures are as of the first day of November, 1919. It will be clear to gentlemen upon this floor that for most of these projects there is now on hand as much money as can reasonably be expended between now and March, 1921.

Mr. DENISON. Will my colleague yield there?

Mr. JUUL. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. The $219,000 on hand for the stretch of the Mississippi River between St. Louis and Cairo will not run the engineer's office one month. They will have to close down and go out of business, so far as that project is concerned.

Mr. JUUL. I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that the matter of money for the Illinois and Mississippi Rivers and for connecting the Great Lakes with the Gulf is very dear to my heart. I feel he knows that I drafted one of the first waterway bills under which the State of Illinois, a few years ago, decided on the improvement of its waterways. I was a member of the Smith drafting committee in Illinois; and the gentleman knows that this subject is as dear to me as it is to any Member on this floor. But let me say to the gentleman that we have been in the habit of expending on an average, on the 50 projects that were in the river and harbor bill when it reached this committee, $14,453,463 a year. That is all they have expended per year. Now we are giving them $12,000,000 additional, and we are telling the Board of Engineers to go ahead and complete the projects for which the money is resting in the United States Treasury.

Gentlemen who have to vote on this bill are confronting this question: Is there anything in the Treasury to the credit of these various projects? My answer is that there is in the vicinity of $60,000,000 to the credit of all the various projects now in the Treasury of the United States, and the $12,000,000 added thereto will make $72,000,000; and the haunting fear of gentlemen upon this floor that commerce is going to suffer during the next 12 months and that the country is going to pieces is not warranted by the facts.

But if the facts were otherwise than as they are I would still come before this body and say, "Gentlemen, for once in our lives we have got to do something to cut down the bills." We have got to cut to the bone. We must do it. Republicans and Democrats alike must be able to go back home to our people and tell them that we realize that it was a fine thing to come home with big appropriations for our localities, but that this once you people must wait a year or two and give us a chance to catch up. [Applause.] Now, what would you gentlemen do if you were running a sawmill or a factory and you were facing a deficit corresponding to the size of the deficit that we are facing, and the man in the bank to whom you were accustomed to go for your loan had told you, "You have got to cut it down. We have got to reduce your credits"? You would retrench in every department. We are facing a deficit in this country that may run up to $3,000,000,000. Now, is it not time to use up the dollars that have been stored up to the credit of these various projects? Is it not time to do that and go home and tell our people that for once in our lives we would rather take a drubbing for being stingy, if you please, just now than to take a drubbing for being extravagant? I want to tell my friends in this House that I will join with them next year and come in and holler loudly for improvements in the Central and Middle West, that will connect the great rivers and lakes with the Gulf, and connect the Great Lakes with the St. Lawrence River, so that we may have an outlet to the sea. [Applause.]

Mr. SMALL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLEARY], a member of the committee.

Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, we have listened to men, some of whom are opposed to all river and harbor bills and some who have spoken from a political standpoint, but as an old friend of waterways I wish to say that I have no political feeling on this subject, and certainly I have no hostility to waterways. I may add that there is no chance, and I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] knows that there is no chance, of his amendment passing, because it affects only one section of the country, and the whole Congress of the United States could not sit here and simply see one section of the country advanced and taken care of specifically without any change for the others.

Therefore, when any change is to be made in this bill, if there is to be any, it will be made just as the engineers have laid it out to our committee. We sat for two weeks listening to them reducing it down to its lowest terms, and that would be the only intelligent way to deal with it. Men get up here and offer amendments who have very little specific knowledge. The committee spent two weeks listening to the engineer make his lowest terms on the bill. If the bill is to be changed at all, it should simply revert from a lump sum to that way of doing it.

The other day I heard our former chairman, Mr. SMALL, mention how the people of the Pacific slope are willing to cooperate better than some other people, and I could not help thinking when he was saying that that about 100 years ago the then governor of New York thought that it would be a good thing to connect the Atlantic Ocean with the great inland seas—the Great Lakes. The State of New York went ahead and did that, and since that time the people of that State have expended more than $200,000,000 in connecting the Atlantic with the Lakes, and they have done it themselves. They never came to Congress and asked Congress to connect those Lakes with the Atlantic. The great State of New York simply did that itself, without any assistance from anybody. Of course it has reaped the reward in the greatest commerce on the face of the earth to-day. I would not fight very much for changes in the bill, because if you gave us nothing, then New York would do it herself; but we do not think you ought to make her do that herself. She is the pathway to Europe, both in times of peace and in times of war. She has undergone great expense in the building up of her docks and her waterways. She has made connections up to the St. Lawrence River through the Champlain Canal and through Lake Champlain and with the Great Lakes through the Erie Canal. It is because she made those improvements that she is great in waterways to-day. We know that the effect of that was to make New York able to pay an immense portion of all of the debts and expenses of this country. We know that she illustrated there what waterways could do. We hope that the other parts of this country, the Mississippi Valley and all of the other places, will in the future do the same thing, through Congress and by themselves, and in that way build up the whole country as it should be built up. Water transportation is cheap transportation, and cheap transportation enables us to send our manufactured goods into the nations of the world in competition with all other nations. Therefore it is a great thing to have cheap transportation. There is no better way to use money than to obtain cheap transportation. There is no use of doing anything in respect to transportation unless it is kept in order. A boat aground is of no use. I remember one time when I was the manager of a Hudson River tug line. I was riding down on a passenger steamer one night and she got aground. We happened to be passing one of our boats, and I hailed the captain and had him send a tug over and pull us off the bank. I was a very popular fellow on that boat that night. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEE].

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I realize that I have not the time in the five minutes allotted to me to explain this matter as it ought to be done. I represent a district in Texas that was virtually destroyed by storm. Port Aransas is the entrance to Aransas Pass and the project to Corpus Christi. A storm came the 14th of September last and not only destroyed thousands of human lives but ruined millions of dollars' worth of property. The Government of the United States has a project at Port Aransas in addition to the one at Aransas Pass. The War Department sent engineers to see what was necessary for immediate action. I want to read to the committee from the report of the district and division engineers of the United States Army how the storm damaged this place, not touching upon other matters which if I had the time would be very pertinent. I read from the report:

Harbor at Port Aransas: Here the greatest loss was naturally suffered, as the storm center passed close to this place. The jetties were severely damaged by unseating cap blocks, washing down slopes and causing gaps. The dike on St. Josephs Land was breached in several places. The office building was damaged and strained, the storerooms with contents were washed away, the wharf and the oil and the water-supply system were all seriously damaged, portions being washed away; several barges and one small power skiff were lost.

They recommend $150,000 as necessary for the repair of the north and south jetties at the harbor and $189,000 for the repairs to the island dikes at St. Josephs Island. I am not going to discuss the question as to the wisdom or the unwisdom of a bill of this kind, but I am appealing to this membership, that this is a proposition which if this bill carries without the amendments that I have offered may mean the absolute destructon of the Government works at Port Aransas in one year's time, because the dikes have been breached and the channel has been filled up and the jetties have been damaged, and every day of erosion and every day of the sweeping of the waters against the dikes and against the jetties is causing that much more damage to the millions of dollars that the United States Government has already expended in maintaining a harbor for the people of the Texas coast. Not only that, but it sounds like a notice to the people of that great section of the State that they are abandoned by the Government of the United States under the terms of this bill, for only $140,000 is available now for maintenance, and that maintenance carries everything connected with it, outside of the dikes and the jetties that are so essential to the channel.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEE. Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I suggest to the gentleman that the engineers recommended nothing in the way of improvements for Aransas Pass.

Mr. BEE. I have already inserted in the RECORD the report made by the engineers. Let me say this to the gentleman from Iowa: I do not know what the engineers recommended to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, as no opportunity was given to present these matters to the committee before this bill was brought up, and under the sudden transition no hearings were had. I have here the report in which the division engineer at New Orleans and the district engineer at Galveston, who visited the place immediately after the storm in October, and they say that $160,000 is necessary for repair of the jetties and $189,000 for the dikes, and only $140,000 is available.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Col. Taylor said that was maintenance work and he could take care of that out of the lump sum, and that he did not need the $15,000 that he originally estimated for improvement purposes.

Mr. BEE. The trouble with the report of Col. Taylor is this: Col. Taylor is dealing with another question outside of the one here presented. He is not dealing with the destruction of the dikes. I have offered these amendments, which I shall expect to have voted on at the proper time, and I wish I could persuade my distinguished friend from Iowa to accept it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HICKEY].

Mr. HICKEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I wish in the few words that I may say with respect to this bill to speak as a friend of the development of the great waterways of the Nation. I feel that the present needs of the country have been well looked after by the committee in this bill. We had hearings covering a long period of time and during that time had a representative from the Chief of Engineers of the War Department before the committee, and we went into the situation carefully with relation to all of the waterways of the Nation. After doing so we concluded that, with the amount at present available for water improvements and the additional amount which this bill provides for, the situation will be taken care of very nicely during the coming year. I have nothing but the most kindly feeling for the gentlemen from the Mississippi Valley, who wish to develop the great waterways of that locality. I think the time will come when Congress and the Nation will feel disposed to deal liberally with that locality.

This bill carries a much smaller appropriation than any rivers and harbors bill submitted to the House in many years. The amount proposed to be appropriated and to be used for the improvement of the rivers and harbors of the country will be at the disposal of the Chief of Engineers of the War Department to be used as in his opinion will best meet the needs of commerce. I voted for this bill in the committee and will vote for it when it comes up for final vote in the House.

Personally, I do not favor this plan of appropriating money. As a policy to be followed generally it would be neither expedient nor wise. There are certain times and certain occasions, however, when it is the wise thing to do. As a rule, Congress itself should determine from facts submitted what money should be used. The committee felt that in view of the many obligations facing the Government that the wiser course would be to make the smallest appropriation possible compatible with the needs of water commerce.

We find the Government burdened at this time with a debt, the exact amount of which is unknown. It has been estimated to be in the neighborhood of $26,210,530,000. We paid out during the period of the war approximately $26,007,000,000. We raised 43 per cent of this sum by taxation, or $11,280,154,000. It will readily be seen that with this great indebtedness now against the Government, and considering the enormous sums that have been collected from the taxpayers and must be collected in order to meet interest charges and the running expenses of the Government that the greatest economy must be observed. Something must be done to give relief to the tax-paying public. The fact that we raised so large a sum by taxation during the war is in a very large measure responsible for the present high cost of living, about which we hear so much.

The individuals and corporations called upon to meet the heavy tax charges to furnish necessary funds required by the Government to carry on the war necessarily charged the amount so paid in such a way that it was carried on to the consuming public. So the people as a whole, whether rich or poor, were compelled to pay the bills, no matter where the money came from in the first instance. I believe Secretary Glass has said that the most vital factor in increasing the cost of living is the excessive Government expenditures.

The estimates coming from the various department heads show that the cost of running the Government during the coming year will be nearly $9,000,000,000. This means a very large deficit based upon the present revenues, and these figures take no account of the interest charges nor of the funds required to retire Government indebtedness as it matures. Considering the state of the Treasury, the committee concluded in this appropriation it would set an example in economy for the big committees.

The question of transportation is one of the big questions we have to deal with to-day. The Government has been operating the railroads for the greater part of the past two years. The standard income of the roads for a year is estimated at something like $904,597,000. This year the loss to the Government will amount to about $320,000,000, so it will be seen that the people are contributing in no small way in maintaining the land transportation agencies of the country. In addition to this contribution of more than three hundred and twenty millions that the Government is making to the railroads, we are paying higher freight rates and higher passenger rates than ever before. One of the first things that Congress did after it convened in May, 1919, was to appropriate $750,000,000 to the railroads. Why was all this money used? The answer is, to assist in maintaining the transportation agencies of the country.

The amounts carried in the rivers and harbors bill for the past four years are as follows:

1920	$33,378,364
1919	23,771,900
1918	27,826,150
1917	40,598,135

For this year it is twelve millions. At the present price of labor and the present cost of material the twelve millions which is carried in this bill will go no further than six millions did in 1914.

The report of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, shows that the water-borne tonnage cared for during this year totaled something like 959,987,125 tons, and that the value of this commerce amounted to $23,823,943,267.44. These are very imposing figures, and this is especially true when it is remembered that the amount of commerce carried during the year of 1919 was carried not because of Government encouragement but with every obstacle thrown in the way of developing or aiding the water commerce of the country. The Government should not be censured for its attitude during this period, for it was very largely due to war conditions.

When we consider the amount of this water-borne commerce we must admit that it is a very substantial contribution to the commerce of the country, and we must also bear in mind that the expense to the people for carrying this commerce has been very small, being on an average of not more than a few cents per ton.

We pay, directly and indirectly, millions of dollars annually for rail transportation but hesitate to appropriate a few millions annually for the maintenance of water transportation, and yet water transportation offers a great field at this time for development, and in developing this commerce, we accomplish two things: First, we furnish the people with cheap transportation. Cheap transportation means lower cost for the things the people use. Second, by maintaining the great waterways of the country, and especially the great navigable rivers, we prevent those rivers from getting out of their banks during certain periods of the year and destroying towns and cities and ruining millions in property. Indeed, one great flood often destroys property greater in value, to say nothing of the lives lost and the suffering caused, than the appropriation in any year for the maintenance or improvement of the rivers and the harbors of the country. And so, as I have indicated, it is poor economy and poor policy to deal in too little a way with an agency capable of playing so large a part in carrying the commerce of the country and in developing the country.

In the years immediately before us the question of transportation is to be of great consequence. Our population is rapidly increasing. We will likely, in the next quarter of a century, have a population exceeding 150,000,000 people. This in itself will require the development of our transportation facilities, both water and rail, and there is no doubt but that in the immediate future every big trunk line will be compelled to lay more tracks. Instead of having double tracks, it may be necessary to have four or six tracks, and the only way that the roads can be developed is by getting the money from the public; there is no other source. The reason for the development of the railroads is that they will transport the commerce of the country for the benefit of the people, and if part of this burden can be assumed at a much smaller charge by using the waterways of the Nation, it seems to me this would be the wise thing to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

By unanimous consent Mr. HICKEY was granted leave to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield six minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN].

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GRIFFIN: Page 2, line 7, after the word "appropriated," strike out the word "may" and insert the word "shall."

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this bill before us has been trumpeted throughout the country as a "porkless" river and harbor bill; but I beg to assure you, and I hope to show you, that if there was ever any bill before this House which contained "pork" this bill unquestionably comes within that class. And my amendment is directed toward eliminating the "pork" by taking out of the power of the United States Army Engineers the discretion to fritter away and waste appropriations as they see fit.

What does "pork" mean, when used in connection with the term "appropriation"? It means an appropriation incontinently wasted, softly spent, or designedly thrown away. Now, gentlemen, in this bill that is what you propose to permit. You give $7,000,000 to be spent carte blanche by the United States Army Engineers. There is an implication in the much-heralded claim as to this bill being without "pork." The implication is that other bills heretofore have had "pork." Well, if they have had "pork" in them, who cut the "pork" up and who distributed it? Why, your Army engineers.

Now, this is worth while considering. Their sole object seems to be to make every project they touch a continuous mendicant. They have exercised their own sweet will as to where the work shall be done and how the work shall be done, and how it shall be perpetuated, and have wasted millions of dollars without bringing really vital projects to a conclusion. While they have been fiddling with the East River, Hell Gate, and other well known and necessary improvements to the waterways of this country the Panama Canal and the New York

Barge Canal, the greatest engineering undertakings in the world's history, have been brought to completion. With Army engineer procrastination no project seems ever to reach a conclusion. At the proper time I propose to introduce a resolution or bill which will take up this question of United States Army administration of waterway appropriations. The body or commission which should attend to the building and deepening of our waterways and harbors should in some way or other be connected with the Navy and not with the Army.

Now, what does my amendment do? I call your attention to the wording of this section. Twelve million dollars are appropriated outright. I know you say you divide that up, $5,000,000 for maintenance and $7,000,000 for projects already authorized. Nothing of the kind. The language of this section reads that the $12,000,000 is "for the preservation and maintenance of existing river and harbor works and for the prosecution of such projects heretofore authorized as may be most desirable in the interest of commerce and navigation." The appropriation is made in bulk. That is the governing clause, and you will see it gives full discretion to use the whole appropriation either for maintenance of old or the prosecution of new work.

Then comes the proviso: Five million dollars for maintenance and $7,000,000 for continuing pending projects. But you do not say that the $7,000,000 "shall" be spent on these authorized improvements, you say it "may" be spent. Now, my amendment proposes to eliminate that indirection and give specific, direct orders to these gentlemen to spend the money where it ought to be spent and where we direct. You should say "shall" and not "may." I do not believe we should surrender to any irresponsible body the reins of government and the keys to the Treasury.

Talk about your "porkless" waterway bill. What is going to happen if these gentlemen are given carte blanche to spend this money and you put no limit on them? You do not say that they "shall," but that they "may."

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman give me two more minutes?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I have not got it.

Mr. GRIFFIN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] can not give me the time, but if you will do it I will be glad to answer your questions.

I have prepared an analysis, which you will find in the appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 21. I would like to have you gentlemen who are interested in this matter——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Look at the table in the Appendix. It shows 39 great river and harbor projects, every one of which has more to its credit unexpended than has been required in the past year to carry on the work. Surely the $7,000,000 of this bill are not going to be allocated to these projects.

Now, look at the next table, where is shown 33 smaller projects, which have not enough on hand to equal their average annual requiremet. Here, possibly, the $7,000,000 will be allocated. But look again. We find that even these projects have $7,321,181 on hand unexpended and that their average annual requirement is $10,837,508.38. Therefore, to give these projects an appropriation sufficient, with the sum on hand, to equal the average annual requirement, or about $3,500,000, would seem to be all that ought to be necessary if our friends on the other side want to make good their boast of a "bone-dry bill." According to that even this vaunted bill would seem to provide for about $3,500,000 of "pork."

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GALLAGHER].

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am very glad to notice that the excitement over this rivers and harbors bill is dying down somewhat, and I hope the House is commencing to realize that navigation is not going to be ruined because of the small appropriation in this bill. To my mind it is all the money that is necessary to carry on the work of improving the rivers this year. I am in favor of spending money on harbors where there is any commerce and on any streams where there is commerce, but the trouble is—and I have been on this committee for nearly 10 years and know—that commerce has been dying out, and that there is a smaller number of boats upon the rivers to-day than there was 10 years ago. There is less commerce on the rivers. We have been spending from twenty to thirty and forty and fifty millions of dollars annually, throwing it into the rivers, and for what purpose? Now, what is the sense of spending on an average nearly $25,000,000 annually to improve rivers where there are no boats, where the people along the rivers make no attempt to provide harbors, where there is no possibility or no evidence of the people anywhere attempting to furnish boats to navigate the rivers?

Now, if you are going to throw money into a river to improve it, there ought to be some evidence before we do it that there is going to be boats provided to navigate it. Why, on the rivers where there is no obstruction to navigation and there is lots of water we have no boats. The gentleman spoke about the Barge Canal, on which New York has spent, as he says, probably $200,000,000. There are no boats on that canal, except boats, I think, that are being operated by the Government.

The only additional boats that are provided for the Mississippi are owned by the Government. Still we are asked to spend more money this year than this bill contains. Why, if I had my way about it, I would knock out the $7,000,000. They do not need it. I hope that with the condition of the Treasury Members will realize that the navigation of the country is not going to be ruined because we refuse to make a large appropriation. The engineers are going to have plenty of money to go on with all the necessary improvements. And I doubt if a number of those named are necessary. Some of the strongest fights I have seen on this floor for the improvement of rivers have been for improvements on rivers that have been discarded by the Government; rivers that they have wasted millions on, and then threw them up as a bad job. People have asked here why we do not pave some of the rivers instead of trying to make them navigable.

Now, I hope there will not be any excitement over this matter, and I hope there will not be any opposition to this bill. No matter if the people in your territory are telling you that they need river improvements, we on the committee know that they do not need them at this time, and that there are going to be no boats on the rivers that you are talking about and want improved for years to come.

I heard it said here the Ohio River was being neglected, and the gentleman from Cincinnati was told the other day that if we did not stop kicking about this bill he would hear from the people in Cincinnati. The only people in Cincinnati he might hear from would be some contractors or from friends or agents that are furnishing supplies to those contractors. If that is the kind of business you want to help out, go ahead and proceed to spend money in the old way. I hope you will realize that this bill is all right.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I want to join the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] in congratulating the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and its distinguished chairman upon this bill. It is one of the most meritorious bills, in my judgment, that have been produced by a Republican Congress.

I have been opposed heretofore, and I am now opposed, to "lump-sum" appropriation, because under ordinary circumstances the lump-sum appropriation can be expended in any way in which the particular department chooses to spend it, and in many cases it has been expended in ways which Congress would never have approved if it had had any anticipation that it would have been so paid out. But every dollar of this appropriation that is made in this bill, and every dollar that is on hand, must be expended in the way that Congress has directed and in accordance with the report of the engineers.

The engineers have heretofore mapped out these plans and presented them to the committee for approval; they have been presented to the committee and have been ratified; and it has been determined that the money shall be expended in that way and in no other. Not a dollar of the money carried in this bill, either for maintenance or for continuance of work on projects, can be expended except in the manner Congress has directed.

Now, it is said that we are "abdicating" our authority by turning over to the engineers the privilege of determining upon which projects the money carried in this bill is going to be expended because it is only a small part that they will have the right to determine. Twenty-five million dollars is on hand, already appropriated, and definitely appropriated, which must be expended on particular projects. They say we are "abdicating" our authority because we leave it to the Board of Engineers to say where some of this money shall be expended. If that is so, we have abdicated our authority long ago, many years ago, because we have always left it to the Board of Engineers to determine whether projects were meritorious or not, and it has been the policy of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors for many years that no money should be expended on a project that is not approved by the Board of Engineers. There is plenty of money on hand to carry out these projects, with a reasonable distribution of the extra money allowed by the committee, in the discretion of the engineers.

A gentleman was talking a moment ago about the Mississippi River from the mouth of the Ohio up to the mouth of the Missouri. As I understand from the chairman of the committee, there is somewhere between $300,000 and $400,000 unexpended for use there.

Mr. MADDEN. It is over $4,000,000.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. They have had an 8-foot navigable channel depth for 10 years.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. This is all that was planned. There is also a large amount of money unexpended which can be used. The country is at this time faced with a deficit of $3,000,000,000; here we are, with a deficit so vast that we know not how to meet it. We have got to economize somewhere, and where can we economize better than at a place where we already have money enough to carry out the projects, so far as the money can be economically expended during the next year? You can not expend all that a project will cost economically in one year. You can not spend any more money than is allowed in this bill economically during the next year. These sums have accumulated in past years. The engineers have not expended them. Why? I suppose because they could not be expended economically. We have sufficient on hand for them to use, if they use it with discretion, in the next year; sufficient for every project that has been approved, with the money that has been allowed in this bill.

With reference to maintenance they are the ones who must determine whether a project shall get money for maintenance, whether it has been injured so that it should be repaired. And who else, I ask, could properly determine such questions? They are the proper ones to determine this matter.

I insist that this bill is one of the most meritorious that has been presented to this Congress. [Applause.]

By unanimous consent, Mr. BLAND of Missouri, Mr. GALLAGHER, Mr. GOLDFOGLE, and Mr. DONOVAN were given leave to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. SMALL. Does the gentleman from Iowa desire us on this side to proceed?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be notified when I have consumed 10 minutes. First, I ask to have this telegram from Representative H. GARLAND DUPRÉ, a member of the committee, read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, LA., January 21, 1920.

Hon. JOHN H. SMALL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

I greatly regret my enforced absence during consideration of rivers and harbors bill, but had received assurance from Chairman KENNEDY that same would not be called up until week of January 26. The bill as reported in press here is niggardly. The amount carried is shamefully inadequate. The measure is a cheap demagogic appeal to economy at the expense of the great waterway interests of the country. Please pair me in any effort made to increase the amount appropriated, and pair me against the bill. I will thank you to read this telegram into the RECORD.

H. GARLAND DUPRÉ.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I have had this telegram read at the request of my friend, Mr. DUPRÉ.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. I yield to the gentleman from Nevada.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. The definition of that word "niggardly" used in the telegram of the gentleman from Louisiana is "meanly avaricious." That is rather a severe term to use toward our Government.

Mr. SMALL. I would not like to take up time discussing that feature. I had the telegram read at the request of my friend from Louisiana.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. I resent having our Government called meanly avaricious, after it has spent hundreds of millions of dollars for rivers and harbors.

Mr. SMALL. I can not yield further for that purpose.

Mr. Chairman, I regret that there seems to be any serious disagreement as to our duty with regard to this bill. I have listened to my distinguished friend from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] and my distinguished friend from Chicago [Mr. GALLAGHER] in their remarks on the bill. The trouble about this bill—and I say it not in any obsession of pride—is that so many people attempt to talk about it and form opinions about it who do not know anything about it. My good friend the gentleman from Chicago [Mr. GALLAGHER] talked about water-borne commerce decreasing. I have here an advance copy of a report from the Bureau of the Census, showing that water-borne commerce in the United States during the 10 years from 1906 to 1916 increased 42 per cent. Statements to the contrary are easily made by gentlemen who want to oppose river and harbor appropriations.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. That includes all water transportation, rivers and harbors both?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. It applies not alone to rivers?

Mr. SMALL. Oh, no; it applies to the rivers and harbors of our country.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Is there anything under discussion at the present time except the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON]? Is not that the only pending amendment?

Mr. SMALL. Other gentlemen have other amendments ready, but the whole of section 1 is under discussion.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Is the gentleman in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON]?

Mr. SMALL. No. If the gentleman had been listening, he would have heard my prior statement to the contrary.

The Committee on Rivers and Harbors was to have reported a bill exercising every possible economy, and yet a bill that was consistent with and that conformed to good judgment and the best policy of the committee. The committee held hearings at which the representative of the Chief of Engineers, Gen. Harry Taylor, was present. He was instructed to reduce and revise the original estimates. The original estimates submitted in round numbers were $9,000,000 for maintenance and $33,000,000 for further improvements. As a result of this direction from the committee he submitted a number of recommendations. In the first place, as to maintenance he thought we could save money by making a lump-sum appropriation of $5,000,000. I did not agree with him as to that method of appropriating even for maintenance, but he having expressed the opinion that we could save in that way several millions of dollars I found it difficult to combat that argument, and the committee determined as to maintenance to recommend an appropriation of $5,000,000.

Then as to appropriations for further improvement he went over the various projects under improvement throughout the country, revised and reduced his recommendations, and when they were completed they made an aggregate of between $19,000,000 and $20,000,000.

After the committee on last Monday morning determined, in deference to directions from what I understand to be the steering committee of the majority, to report a bill carrying $12,000,000, a lump sum, $5,000,000 for maintenance and $7,000,000 for improvement, and during the interval of yesterday my colleague [Mr. LEA of California] and I prepared a substitute for section 1 of the pending bill. This substitute appropriates $5,000,000 for maintenance and then takes up the several items of improvement recommended by Gen. Harry Taylor, with the appropriations as recommended by him, and that proposed substitute is printed in the RECORD of this morning on pages 1957 and 1958, and I invite the attention of gentlemen to it.

I shall offer a motion to recommit this bill with instructions to report it back with that as a substitute for section 1, and I shall say at the time that I am opposed to the pending bill.

When this bill came up in the House day before yesterday we were told by the majority leaders that it must be passed the same day. Having had no opportunity to prepare any substitute and being confronted with the alternative of supporting this bill or having no river and harbor bill at this session, I was in doubt as to my duty. The interval of yesterday gave us time to draft an appropriate substitute, and I shall offer the same on a motion to recommit this bill. I shall therefore vote against this bill for the reasons given in my opening remarks on Tuesday last. I hope the Members of the House who believe in maintaining and improving the waterways and harbors of the country will join with us in voting for the substitute for section 1.

Now, I wish to say that this substitute, giving these various appropriations toward the further improvement of about 49 projects, represents, in the opinion of the Chief of Engineers, the very lowest sum which ought to be appropriated to be expended between now and March 4, 1921.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Is it not also true that those recommendations were based on the policy of the engineers to proceed with a project after Congress has adopted it with a view to completing it, and that the estimates are not made on the basis of what commerce will need in the next fiscal year?

Mr. SMALL. I am sorry I can not agree with my friend on that proposition, because there are a number of projects which have been heretofore authorized and which have not been completed and are in course of construction, and yet no appropriations are recommended for them. It was repeated to me not longer ago than this morning by Gen. Taylor that these proposed appropriations here represent the irreducible minimum, as it were, which Congress ought to appropriate for these projects to be expended between now and March 4, 1921, and that these amounts are necessary in the interest of those projects and in the interest of the water-borne commerce of the country, and this proposed substitute was submitted to Gen. Taylor and received his final approval.

Who is Gen. Taylor? He has been the representative of the Chief of Engineers in river and harbor matters for a number of years. He was the representative of the Chief of Engineers when the distinguished gentleman from New York, Mr. Alexander, was chairman of this committee, and for a time when Mr. Burton was chairman of the committee, and also during the entire time, as I recall it, when Mr. Sparkman, of Florida, was chairman of the committee. He stands high as an engineer and is regarded as an expert in the improvement of rivers and harbors, and I repeat again that this proposed substitute for section 1 is approved by him in its entirety and in detail, and if any gentleman is not satisfied with my statement in that respect he has the liberty of telephoning Gen. Taylor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has occupied 10 minutes. He wished to be notified at the end of that time.

Mr. SMALL. I thank the Chair, and will consume several minutes more.

Now, how about this $25,000,000 that they say is available and unexpended? I discussed that matter day before yesterday. I thought my ideas upon it were clear. I have discussed it again with Gen. Taylor since this bill was under consideration, day before yesterday, and he instructed me to say that the statement which I made here in the House on that day was correct; that all these available balances were taken into consideration when these appropriations were recommended.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I hardly think Gen. Taylor would instruct a Member of Congress as to what he should say on the floor.

Mr. SMALL. Certainly, Gen. Taylor did not undertake to instruct me as to what I should say; but I was simply ascertaining as to whether he approved the statement which I had made. The statement was this, and I repeat it, that all of these available balances had been taken into consideration when he made the recommendations for these appropriations.

Now, Mr. Chairman, many Members will be disappointed because there are no appropriations for the further improvement of projects in their sections and districts. Many are omitted. There are only 49 here for which appropriations for further improvements are recommended, and in every one of those the representative of the Chief of Engineers, Gen. Taylor, says they are absolutely essential. These rivers which are embodied in the substitute amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] are all cared for in the proposed substitute which I am going to offer on a motion to recommit, but with lesser sums than are embodied in the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

I would like to say this personal word, if I may, which may add something, if you please, if it is necessary, to my effort to be perfectly frank and sincere in this matter. I believe if there is an important improvement in the country, it is a section of the intracoastal waterway from Norfolk to Beaufort, N. C. Money will be needed upon that waterway before March 4, 1921, and yet not a dollar is appropriated here for it, and it is not embodied in this proposed substitute which I am going to offer. The chairman will remember that I asked for more time in order to secure evidence as to the necessity of an appropriation for this project. The fact remains that up to this time no recommendation for an appropriation for this waterway has been submitted, and it is not included among the estimates in my substitute. Of course, I am disappointed. Does not this situation entitled me to some consideration for frankness and sincerity?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Of course, the gentleman understands that the engineers made no recommendation for an appropriation for that particular improvement.

Mr. SMALL. I have just so stated.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. They claim to have sufficient money on hand.

Mr. SMALL. I say that they have omitted this, as they have omitted a number of others, and I only mention it for the personal reason assigned.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The gentleman's motion to recommit would not take that in?

Mr. SMALL. No; the motion to recommit would take in just the improvements mentioned here. Just this other thought. Here are appropriations aggregating $19,443,000 for further improvements. If you add that to the $5,000,000 for maintenance, you will have an aggregate of a little less than $25,000,000. I want to call the attention of gentlemen to what a $7,000,000 appropriation for further improvements will mean.

Take the East River and Hell Gate, N. Y., where there is recommended $2,100,000, one of the great improvements of the country. Under the $7,000,000 appropriation, if divided proportionately, that would get only about $700,000. Take the Delaware River, for which in this substitute $2,000,000 is recommended. That would only get a little above $600,000, or seven-nineteenths of nineteen and a half million dollars. The same observation would apply to other improvements. In some instances the amount allotted would be so small that it would be negligible; it would be waste to attempt to expend it, because it is wasteful upon some of these great improvements to expend a small amount of money on account of the fact that the amount of expense involved in getting ready to begin the work is so great.

I shall not take up the time of the committee further, except to say that I hope when this motion to recommit is made that it will meet with the approval of the friends of river and harbor improvements, the friends of water-borne commerce, and the friends who wish to add increased facilities to the transportation of the country. It represents the best judgment of the Chief of Engineers, and with every desire to exercise the most rigid economy.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. The substitute which the gentleman offers in his motion to recommit carries with it only those recommendations made by the Board of Engineers for additional appropriations for further improvements?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. The Ouachita River, for instance, which has now a system of locks and dams in Louisiana and Arkansas, will not be cared for in this motion to recommit for the reason that the engineers made no recommendation to increase the appropriation for the project there now in course of construction?

Mr. SMALL. That is correct.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. For the reason there is now on hand and unexpended $304,000, an amount sufficient to prosecute the work until March, 1921, when the next river and harbor bill becomes a law?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Would the gentleman's motion to recommit carry any larger sum in the aggregate than the $12,000,000?

Mr. SMALL. Yes; the aggregate of the appropriations here in this motion to recommit will be $19,443,000, plus the $5,000,000 for maintenance, making the aggregate between $24,000,000 and $25,000,000. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOODYKOONTZ].

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, I am gratified that the Republican members of the committee, having in charge the rivers and harbors appropriation bill, which bill is now under consideration, have severely pruned it. The minority members, judging from their remarks, were anxious to have the bill carry at least $100,000,000, but the majority members, in wisdom, have reduced the figures to twelve millions, of which five millions is to cover the cost of maintenance of the works now existing and the residue of seven millions is to be used in completing improvements heretofore authorized by Congress.

On yesterday the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY], chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, announced that his committee would not, at this session, report a bill for post offices and other public buildings; this action will save the Treasury many millions of dollars. There are needed in the district which I have the honor to represent several post-office buildings, and these, or some of them, would have been provided for had the bill been reported, but in view of the alarming condition of the Treasury, the severity of existing taxation, and the tremendously high cost of living, I know that the people will heartily approve the action of the majority. That action is drastic but necessary. All other departments of the Government must be treated in similar fashion. There are 40,000 too many clerks here in Washington. I am informed that in one building, the one occupied by the War Risk Insurance Bureau, there are about 14,000 employees—enough to run a dozen or more of the great life insurance companies of the country. Not only that, but it is true that 60 per cent of the insurance taken out by soldiers has lapsed.

What is true of the War Risk Insurance Department is likewise true as respects other departments. We know that it is necessary for a surgeon to apply the knife to a cancerous growth or a diseased appendix in the human body, and in like fashion must Congress promptly slice appropriations and thereby force the innumerable departments, boards, bureaus, and commissions to release thousands and thousands of girls and boys who ought to be at their homes. Furthermore, a lot of these boards and commissions ought to be dissolved. Some of them were organized during the war, but the members still have their hands in Uncle Sam's pockets. A lot of good places were provided for some lame ducks. I happen to know of one gentleman defeated for Congress at the last election who is nicely fixed up, being attached to the Railroad Administration and drawing the not-to-be-despised salary of $25,000 per year. This case is only one of many. And yet should we wonder why freight and passenger rates are high or why the service is rotten or why the Government has lost millions in operating the roads. In a matter such as this Congress has but little to say.

The President has been operating the railroads by virtue of his war power. The loss on railroads alone will probably exceed a billion dollars and must be made good out of the pockets of the people. In order to cover the cost of waste and mismanagement of Government operation of railroads, telephones, telegraphs, and cables there must be continuous heavy taxation.

Having submitted these general observations, I shall now ask your kind attention to another proposition, which I would like briefly to discuss, namely, the IMPROVEMENT OF THE WATERS OF THE BIG SANDY RIVER.

The Big Sandy River empties into the Ohio at Catlettsburg, Ky., and Kenova, W. Va. The Big Sandy forms part of the boundary line between the States mentioned. It is 27 miles in length and is formed at Louisa, Ky., and Fort Gay, W. Va., by the junction of the Levisa and Tug Forks. The Levisa or western fork rises in Virginia and runs through Kentucky; the Tug has its source in West Virginia. The plan of development of these streams contemplated a 6-foot stage of water to be produced by a series of locks and dams—3 in the main river, 10 on the Levisa, and 8 on the Tug, making 21 in all. The dam farthest up the Levisa, 88.5 miles distant, was to be at Pikeville, Ky., and the one farthest up the Tug was to be located at the mouth of Pond Creek, opposite Williamson, W. Va., 58.1 miles from the junction.

Five locks and dams—three in the main river and the lower one in each fork—have been completed and are ready for operation. The cost of this work, including maintenance to June 30, 1919, has amounted to $1,649,593.74. The object of Congress in undertaking this internal improvement was to provide easy access and cheap transportation for the almost inexhaustible beds or seams of coal that set in about 40 miles from the junction on each fork and extend thence southward to the very sources of these waters.

Unfortunately, the first dam in the river was placed about 1,000 feet from the river's mouth, with the result that in dry seasons there is only about 3 feet of water in the channel below leading to the Ohio, and thus it is that boats from the Ohio can not get into the pool nor boats navigating the pool reach the Ohio. Then, again, the slack water in the pools in the respective forks falls short by about 25 miles of reaching the coal-bearing regions.

With the coming into power of President Wilson, his administration and party did not take kindly to the Big Sandy project. Statesmen from the South, for the first time in a decade having free rein and desiring to take advantage of the opportunity, diverted the stream of appropriations in the direction of the alligator ponds and bayous of the sunny South.

The Secretary of War, acting under authority of law, appointed a special board of officers to make a "preliminary report" on the Big Sandy project. Army engineers years before had not only made preliminary reports, but had made surveys and final reports, showing the absolute feasibility and the impelling necessity for the undertaking. For the purpose of making the "preliminary report" Col. Dan C. Kingman, of Savannah, Ga., gave notice of a public hearing to be held at Catlettsburg. On the appointed day over 150 prominent citizens—heads of boards of trade, chambers of commerce, water and improvement associations, and men in private capacity from Williamson, Huntington, and Kenova in West Virginia; Pikeville, Louisa, Inez, Ashland, and Catlettsburg in Kentucky; and Ironton, Portsmouth, and Cincinnati in Ohio—presented facts and figures and reasons why the work should be continued according to the original plan. The only opposition was presented by the two railroads, who were represented at the meeting by their officials, whose business might be affected if the work were completed.

In a report to the Secretary of War, dated September 8, 1914, Col. Kingman expressed the view that the further improvement of these waters was not deemed advisable at that time, and "recommended that the slack-water improvement of these streams be discontinued."

The reasons assigned by Col. Kingman for his action were that the railroads could handle the traffic; that enough tonnage had not been carried on the pools to warrant the belief that the scheme would be a financial success; that the streams were too tortuous, and so forth.

Certainly it is true that there is but little water-borne traffic, for boats from the Ohio can not get into the pools on account of the sand bar between the Ohio and the first dam, but this difficulty will be overcome when the dam which is now in process of construction in the Ohio, below Ashland, is in operation; but there can be no traffic of consequence until additional dams are placed in the forks and navigable water extended into the coal fields. The contention that the streams are too crooked to be capable of being navigated is unworthy of any consideration by one who has observed the width and length of the rafts of saw logs that go down these streams on the spring and fall tides. Therefore, as is plain to be seen, the work projected must be completed if the scheme is to be successful.

The five completed locks and dams standing alone are of no more practical use than a house completed except for its roof, or a railroad bridge with one span missing, or a wagon lacking its wheels.

The reasons assigned by Col. Kingman for his action are nothing more than excuses. His action in attempting to overrule prior decisions and judgments of Government engineers and of Congress ought not to stand. The cost of transportation by water is estimated to be about one-fourth the cost of transportation by rail. The railroads can not handle the traffic; they are constantly refusing to allow coal sidings, upon the ground that they have all the business that they can handle. The railroads are without competition, therefore the rates are very high. It costs less to bring freight from Chicago to Kenova, a distance of over 500 miles, than from Kenova to Williamson, a distance of less than 100 miles. With water transportation on the Big Sandy and its forks all this would be changed. With water transportation Williamson, a town of 8,000 inhabitants, Matewan, Nolan, Naugatuc, Kermit, Crum, Webb, Glen Hays, Fort Gay, and Kenova, and other points along these waters in West Virginia, would put on new life and hum with industry.

The products of the mine and the farm would go out and merchandise would come in at a very cheap rate. Pikeville, a growing city of 5,000 people, Inez, Paintsville, Louisa, Ashland, and Catlettsburg, all in Kentucky, would benefit to the same extent as their West Virginia neighbors.

The people of the Big Sandy Valley are not of the kind to tamely submit to the edict of Col. Kingman, of Savannah, Ga. They are not willing that valuable works costing over one and a half millions of dollars shall remain idle; that the great scheme of enabling the shipment of coal at a low figure out onto the Ohio and Mississippi shall be aborted; that valuable coal lands now lying idle for lack of sidings and cars shall have their value lost and destroyed.

I have thus, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, brought this matter to your attention in order that you might understand that West Virginians and Kentuckians do not acquiesce in Col. Kingman's decree and in order that silence may not in the future be plead as an estoppel against our demand for the appropriations necessary to complete the job according to the original survey, plans, and recommendation of the Army engineers, approved by Congress as far back as the days of William McKinley.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, at such time as the Treasury of the Government will justify the action of Congress in passing a general appropriation bill for the improvement of rivers and harbors the Members of the House from Kentucky and West Virginia will respectfully ask that the work projected on the Tug and the Levisa Forks of the Big Sandy River be resumed and carried forward to an early completion.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MANSFIELD].

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I have introduced an amendment to the Denison amendment, and I ask permission that it be read at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be reported for the information of the committee.

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANSFIELD: Amend the Denison amendment, after the word "Cairo" and preceding the first proviso, by inserting another paragraph, as follows:

"There is hereby appropriated $301,300 for continuing the improvements at Freeport Harbor, Tex."

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman, the figures embraced in that amendment are the figures as recommended by the engineers of the War Department. I appreciate all that has been said by the gentlemen in behalf of the Mississippi and the Missouri and the Ohio Rivers. It was in the watershed of those great streams that I first saw the light of day. My Saturday evening bathings were in the swimming holes of a tributary of that great stream, and, with the exception of the great State which I have the honor in part to represent, I know of no country to-day that is dearer to my heart than the great valley of the Mississippi and its tributaries.

Freeport Harbor, many of you have heard of. It is upon the Gulf of Mexico, 34 miles west of Galveston. The harbor is within the mouth of the Brazos River, a stream that drains 37,000 square miles of territory, a territory that produced in 1918 approximately $250,000,000 worth of cotton, a large portion of which, as a matter of course, would have found its way to the foreign markets of the world through Freeport if the harbor and bar had been dredged to the depth that has been approved by the engineers. The river for many miles above its mouth has a good, practical depth, but at the mouth of the stream a bar prevented the traffic from going in and coming out. Some 15 or 18 years ago private parties organized a company and built jetties approximately 1 mile in length at a cost of $1,449,000.

In the rivers and harbors bill of 1888 and 1889 the Government took these jetties over without any compensation whatever to those who constructed them at such great expense other than the obligation to secure and maintain a depth of 22 feet of water across the bar and in the channel. Since that time appropriations have been made from time to time and a depth of about 18 feet was obtained at the time of our entry into the war and exports and imports began to increase enormously. Since those jetties were constructed, since the harbor was taken over by the Government, the great sulphur mine was discovered there, and developed to a production of more than 49 per cent of the sulphur output of the United States. During the years 1917 and 1918, the period of our participation in the war, this mine furnished to the Government of the United States, directly and indirectly, more than 600,000 tons of sulphur for war purposes. From the year 1914 to October, 1919, more than 1,000,000 tons were shipped out by all-rail route, nearly all of which would have gone by water, and at far less cost, if ships of sufficient draft could have entered the port.

During the same period—from 1914 to October, 1919—445,717 tons of sulphur passed through the harbor at Freeport, but owing to the failure to maintain the required depth, many of the ships had to load light and then go to Galveston or Texas City to complete their cargoes. For this purpose large quantities of sulphur had to be shipped around by rail to those ports, which entailed an additional cost upon the sulphur trade to be passed to the consumer. From May to October of last year 37,546 tons were shipped to Galveston and Texas City to be loaded upon shipboard there, where, on account of the absence of docks especially suited for the purpose, the process of loading was rendered far more expensive than at the docks in Freeport, where, with the splendid system of docks and chutes adapted for the purpose, the process of loading was negligible.

Still, Mr. Chairman, the freight charges on the tonnage shipped to Galveston and Texas City, and the added cost of loading on the ships at those places, do not by any means represent the entire burdens imposed. The difficulty in securing the necessary cars and other equipment for the prompt handling of this tonnage has been very great, though no accusation or blame should rest upon the Railroad Administration. It, too, perhaps, has its troubles and its difficulties. But, Mr. Chairman, in spite of the great care and diligence exercised by those directing the railroads, the fact remains that on account of delays in these shipments an additional loss of nearly $70,000 was passed to the consumers of sulphur. On account of the shallow harbor the past year, some of the larger vessels in the sulphur trade could not enter the harbor at Freeport at all, but took their entire cargoes at other ports, requiring as many as 190 cars to complete the load. It was impossible to obtain the necessary cars of the required type promptly, which resulted in the payment of demurrage charges amounting in some cases to more than $2,000 per day for each day of delay.

SULPHUR HELPED TO WIN THE WAR.

Freeport sulphur, Mr. Chairman, was a most potent factor in winning the war. Appreciating its importance, our Government, soon after our entry into the conflict, through the War Industries Board, took over the operation of this mine. Gen. Pershing, before going to France, being then in command of the troops in Texas, placed soldiers there to protect it from possible internal enemies, while the Navy took the necessary precautions to guard it from attack by sea. Sulphur is the principal basic raw material of sulphuric acid, which was used so extensively in the manufacture of smokeless powder, T. N. T., and the toxic acids, all of which were so essential in winning the war. About 12 per cent of the output of this mine was taken by the Government under direct purchase, approximately 70 per cent additional was consumed in indirect contracts with the Government for the manufacture of explosives, leaving about 18 per cent only for the general trade, the greater portion of which was used in the manufacture of paper.

HIGH COST OF PRINT PAPER LARGELY DUE TO HIGH COST OF SULPHUR.

Of the various uses of sulphur other than for war purposes Dr. Philip S. Smith, of the United States Geological Survey, in Part II of "Mineral Resources of the United States, 1916," says:

> Sulphur is used for many different purposes, but the greatest consumption is in the manufacture of paper and in the preparation of chemicals. According to information from paper manufacturers, about one-eighth of a ton of sulphur is used for each ton of sulphite pulp manufactured.

The United States census reports show that 136,456 short tons of sulphur were used in the manufacture of paper pulp in the year 1914. The war in Europe was commenced that year and wrought a great change in the newsprint-paper situation. Sulphur was then rapidly diverted from the channels of ordinary trade and devoted to the manufacture of explosives. As a consequence the supply of paper at once began to diminish, and correspondingly the price increased. Sulphur has not yet returned to its normal status, and until it does the paper situation must of necessity remain acute.

Mr. Chairman, this Freeport mine having the past few years produced such an enormously large proportion of the sulphur of the United States, it follows that any increased burdens placed upon it will have an appreciable effect upon the price of sulphur and the price of those commodities of which it is an essential in the production. Its principal use in time of war being for the manufacture of explosives for the Government, the Government, of course, paid the cost of production in the price paid for the explosives. Its principal use in time of peace being for the manufacture of print paper, I know of no business more seriously affected by it than that of the newspaper business.

The failure of the Government to provide and maintain the depth of 22 feet at Freeport, as stipulated in the contract under which it acquired the jetties at that place, has caused an extra burden to the sulphur industry there amounting to more than $414,000 the past year, which, of course, goes as an unnecessary burden upon the users of sulphur products. Fortunately a new sulphur mine of great promise has recently been opened up in Matagorda County, Tex., some 30 miles west of the Freeport mine, but it, too, will have its shipping troubles unless the interconstal canal is enlarged. This canal, with a depth of only 5 feet or less, is entirely inadequate for shipping purposes, and the Texas Gulf Sulphur Co., the owners of this new mine, give us the assurance that by giving this canal a depth of 9 feet its shipments alone will amount to not less than 2,000 barrels of oil and 1,200 tons of sulphur per day every day in the year.

Sulphur, of course, has been the principal article of export; but since the discovery and development of the new oil field at Columbia, on the Brazos River, 25 miles above Freeport, fuel oil would now be a close second for foreign and coastwise trade, provided the harbor had the depth of 22 feet, as recommended by the engineers, or even the depth of 18 feet, which it had at the beginning of the war. Notwithstanding the difficulties encountered, still considerable quantities of the oil from this new field were brought down the river on barges and loaded into light tank ships and passed through Freeport Harbor during the last six or eight months, which from March to November of last year amounted to 37,692 tons, and would undoubtedly have reached several hundred thousand tons the present year with the necessary depth in the channel. The Gulf Refining Co., one of the largest of its kind operating in the State, has commenced the construction of its docks, with the view that the present Congress would take the necessary steps to deepen the bar sufficiently to permit the free ingress and egress of at least light-draft tankers suitable for this trade.

Oil has also been a leading article of import during the past five years, and from 1914 to October, 1919, 895,435 tons were brought in from the rich fields of Tampico, Mexico; but this industry, like the sulphur industry, has suffered seriously on account of the shallow water. Lightering has been resorted to at heavy additional expense, and a number of serious accidents have recently occurred due to the shallow harbor. One tanker of the whaleback type, while being placed in position, became unmanageable because of the tug not having the necessary range of free action on account of the shoal. The ship ran upon the jetties, receiving serious injuries, and had to be beached to prevent sinking. Both the ship and the tug were out of commission for many months and had to be taken to Mobile, Ala., for repairs, that being the nearest dry dock available at the time. These repairs cost more than $40,000, and the value of the time the vessels were out of commission was worth much more.

But notwithstanding the great importance of sulphur and oil, Freeport was rapidly developing into a port of consequence in the handling of other commodities when, on account of the war, practically all shipping was withdrawn for war purposes. Large quantities of such things as bagging and ties, binder twine, canned goods, dry goods, drugs, implements and general hardware, linoleums, heavy machinery of all kinds, paints and oils, wire, paper, cement, and other commodities were being handled through that port. With the deepening of the channel and harbor and a return of the ships to supply the needs of commerce, Freeport would soon take high rank as a port of general entry and departure.

Mr. Chairman, without disparagement to any other Texas port, I will simply, by way of comparison, call attention to the following facts: According to the estimates of the engineers of the War Department a depth of 25 feet at Port Aransas would cost $3,255,750; Sabine Pass, $5,476,000; Houston Ship Channel, $3,777,000; and a 26-foot channel at Galveston is estimated at $8,143,996. The same engineers estimate the cost of a 25-foot channel at Freeport at only $455,000, or less than one-seventh of the cost of procuring that depth at any other port in Texas, and all of those ports are most worthy projects.

Mr. Chairman, we will further take into consideration the fact that Freeport is fortunately situated, geographically speaking, with reference to the great producing centers of south and central Texas. It is within 35 miles of two out of the three greatest sulphur mines of the world; within 25 miles of one of the greatest producing oil fields of the world; and within 100 miles of at least a half dozen oil fields; within 35 to 80 miles of the great rice fields of the Colorado River Valley; at the very entrance of the great productive valleys of the Brazos and Colorado Rivers, Old Caney, and the San Bernard, unsurpassed for fertility by any other country on earth, and which produced in 1918 over $250,000,000 worth of cotton alone and other farm products in proportion, and annually producing other farm crops valued at several hundred million dollars.

Mr. Chairman, it would hardly seem possible that other or better reasons could be given for the undertaking and carrying out this much-needed improvement, but if required to make the effort I would simply call attention to the fact that the river frontage of many miles will always afford ample room for the accommodation of the great commerce that will develop; that this frontage will always be available to any legitimate industry requiring port facilities; that under the act of Congress appropriating it the facilities can never be dominated by any special interest; and that free wharfage privileges are guaranteed for all time, resulting in a substantial saving on all tonnage passing through the port.

Mr. Chairman, deep water is the crying need for Freeport and south Texas. More water is our demand. Congress having rendered other liquids impossible, certainly we should not be denied these great privileges which nature has placed within our reach. [Applause.]

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. EVANS].

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Mr. Chairman, labor is scarce and wages high, costing double to do work as formerly. It is a most opportune time to save money. Here we have the spectacle of the richest section of our great country asking subsidies. We were careless and debonair prewar, but now we owe $25,000,000,000. Those worthy people of the most prosperous section in all the world, with billions of money in lands, should relieve a Government which has been kind to them. Why do not the Representatives of that great section say that a Divine Providence has blessed our section more than anywhere on earth, therefore we resolve to refuse further charity from a beneficent Government? Of what use is pouring money into rivers while permitting rails to assault and create unfair rates. You have had this special privilege until you are morally a little soft. Voluntarily relinquish this pension; you will gain tenfold in self-reliance and self-respect. You have had staggering amounts of money, and water transportation not increased. You have citizens who would furnish water transportation if given protection from rail rates against "out-of-pocket cost."

The question of inland waterways as affecting railroads and transportation is a national problem. It will not be solved upon the basis of sectional advantage. Astute railroad men with acute sense for monopoly will not assassinate the natural means for transporting goods. Waterways can no longer be used to serve special privilege. Paying princely salaries to sagacious experts for bringing rails to the very brink of bankruptcy. This will not rest with some favored community receiving a few millions from the Treasury under the flimsy pretext of water traffic, who will then sit supinely by and approve crafty men discriminating to sink the boats. It is a question of national welfare. It is more than rates between cities. It is more than railroad transportation alone, but of transportation in general over highways, railroads, and steamship lines, concerning the entire Nation which it serves. Grant to each branch of the industry a fair field for development, each specializing where best fitted. Water traffic will grow of its own accord when penetrating railroad men give way to honesty of conduct, when our Government ceases to reward manipulators of those grand properties by guaranties against loss from operation, when subtle men can no longer draw pensions for mismanaging railroads, when localities with self-denial and self-reliance build and develop their own systems peculiar to their needs, serving themselves with efficiency and economy, who will scorn the idea of assaulting the Treasury without sense of shame and will not permit shrewd rail managers to scuttle their ships.

There are hopeful signs that the future Congressman will make his campaign upon some other claim than the amount of bacon he can bring home.

A policy of aiding the Government instead of collusion for subsidy to favored districts and special privilege.

But to-day, with our Government $25,000,000,000 in debt, because rivers and harbors has $60,000,000 in a fund still unexpended, this measure is called niggardly because it carries $12,000,000. The definition of niggardly is meanly, avaricious, parsimonious.

After sections of our country with the natural advantages afforded where land and water meet have had hundreds of millions of Government money expended in their vicinity, now style it a niggardly policy.

There is a statement which is correct, "Transportation is the vital need of the Mississippi Valley." That is the vital need of every other section, but you have men strong and patriotic enough to furnish water transportation; give them a square deal, not "out of pocket cost." We will settle the transportation problem permanently upon national lines of justice to all sections until sections disappear and grow into one great mutual Nation.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I also ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend and revise his remarks on the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHREVE].

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to join with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] and others in extending my congratulations to the distinguished chairman of this committee and his able associates. I want to say that I believe at this time there is wisdom in making an appropriation in a lump sum for maintenance.

I will briefly refer to a condition that obtains at my home, Erie, Pa. Those who are familiar with the situation know that we have the finest harbor on the chain of lakes, protected by a great peninsula 7 miles long, with a narrow opening into it of about 400 feet. There is no finer harbor anywhere in the world that I know of. For half a century or more the peninsula has protected the large amount of shipping inside of the harbor. About two years ago the winds came and the waves came and there was a break in the peninsula. A couple of thousand dollars at one time would have made the necessary repairs, but the money was not available. It could not be found. And finally this last year the contract for repairs was let for $214,000, $212,000 of which can be considered as wasted, for $2,000 would have repaired the break at one time and have left the peninsula in much better shape than it will be after the expenditure of $214,000.

So I say, gentlemen, I can see great wisdom in this lump-sum appropriation, because it makes immediately available funds that may be used in just such cases of emergency as arose in Erie Harbor.

In this connection I wish to refer to some remarks I made in the Sixty-third Congress, while the Rivers and Harbors bill was being considered, which apply to the harbor at Erie, Pa.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to inquire of the chairman of the committee, the distinguished gentleman from Florida, regarding appropriations for the Erie Harbor. I do not propose to criticize the committee or the engineers or pay any compliments to my colleagues on the floor of the House, and neither do I propose to discuss any subjects that are not germane to this bill, but I find on page 7 an appropriation of $167,375 for completing the improvements at the harbor at Buffalo, which is probably 80 miles to the east of our harbor. I also find on page 39 an item for improving the harbor at Conneaut, Ohio, carrying an appropriation of $243,530. Conneaut Harbor is 30 miles to the west of us. I also find for Fairport an appropriation of $158,000—Fairport is about 70 miles from Erie—and an appropriation for Cleveland, 99 miles away, of $200,000; and, going a little farther, to the harbor of Toledo, about 200 miles away, I find an appropriation of $135,000. I assume it is the policy of the Government and of this committee to improve all the harbors of Lake Erie. Now, inasmuch as the harbor of Erie during 1912 had a commerce of 3,135,725 tons, at a value of $82,507,650, leads me to ask the committee what appropriations are available for Erie Harbor during this year?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, the reason there is no item placed in this bill for Erie Harbor is that the Chief of Engineers made no estimate for such an item in this bill. He states in his report:

"That no estimate for funds is made for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, for Erie Harbor because funds on hand are sufficient for ordinary maintenance during the fiscal year, and that is all there is to do there."

The project upon which we have worked for quite a number of years there has been completed and all that is needed is the maintenance of the harbor channel and the harbor. There was on the 30th of June last year $84,164 on hand, and there is on hand at the present time $41,600, which the engineers say is quite enough to maintain the channel and harbor until the next bill.

Mr. SHREVE. Then I understand there is an unexpended balance of over $40,000, and the engineers estimate this sum would be sufficient for maintenance during the fiscal year.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is the estimate; yes, sir.

Mr. EDWARDS. I would like to suggest to the gentleman in that connection not only is the amount on hand to which the chairman referred, but on July 1, 1913, there was $33,905 covered by an uncompleted contract.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, instead of saying for the fiscal year ending June 30 of this year, I should have said until the 4th of March, 1915, when another bill will be due.

Mr. MOORE. May I ask the gentleman is it not a fact that the State of Pennsylvania also makes an appropriation for Erie Harbor?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes; I am very glad my colleague from Pennsylvania mentions that fact. The policy of the State of Pennsylvania is to contribute largely to her harbors—the two principal harbors, one at Philadelphia and one at Erie. Way back more than a century ago this harbor was established, and a considerable sum of money has been expended by the State during all that time. During the last four or six years the appropriations by the State of Pennsylvania for the Erie Harbor amounts to more than twice, or double, the amount received from the National Government. In this connection I desire to say that all appropriations from the National Government for all time are as follows:

Appropriations and allotments.

To June 30, 1890 (as listed in H. Doc. No. 421)	$841,867.23
Sept. 19, 1890	40,000.00
July 13, 1892	40,000.00
Aug. 18, 1894	10,000.00
May 11, 1896	1,289.33
Mar. 3, 1899	125,000.00
June 13, 1902	125,000.00
Mar. 3, 1905	125,000.00
Mar. 2, 1907	120,000.00
June 25, 1910	70,000.00
Feb. 27, 1911	30,000.00
Total	1,528,156.56
Received from sales	4,725.72
Grand total	1,532,882.28
Subtracting the amount to June 30, 1890	841,867.23
In last 24 years we received	691,015.05

The natural advantages of the harbor have assisted materially in the low cost of improvements and maintenance, but the time is soon coming when larger developments will have to be made to accommodate the increasing shipping. Fully realizing the importance of these improvements, the city planning committee, acting under recent legislation enacted by the Pennsylvania Legislature, have prepared elaborate plans for harbor improvements. The construction of extensive docks is being considered by the State and city, which will require a uniform harbor depth of 22 feet, and the anchorage basin will have to be enlarged to meet the rapidly growing requirements of commerce.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, my time being so limited, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I am very much disappointed with the river and harbor bill as reported by the committee, and which seems certain of passage in its present form. I have always been opposed to lump-sum appropriations no matter for what department nor how efficient the department may be. I have likewise always opposed the appropriation of unexpended balances, because I believe it against the policy of economy and certainly is not in the interest of economy.

I had expected an economical river and harbor bill, but I was in hopes it would be in line with the policy which has always been pursued by the River and Harbor Committee and by this House in making definite appropriations for definite projects.

According to the bill before us, no project is given any specific sum. It is left entirely with the Secretary of War upon the recommendation of the Board of Engineers how to apportion the money. There are many projects which have more money at their disposal at this time than can possibly be expended during the next fiscal year, or until March of 1921, as is intended by this bill. There are other projects, however, whose appropriations are lean and small and will not effectively carry on the work until the next act is passed. For instance, the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] has to the credit of his project, embracing East River and Hell Gate, N. Y., nearly four and three-fourths millions of dollars—more than sufficient to carry him until larger appropriations come. Naturally he is in favor of this bill.

Take Baltimore, however, which had at its disposal in July last the sum of $600,652, but upon which have been drawn two contracts, one for the widening and deepening of the channel into Curtis Bay, the other for the construction of the new channel into Spring Gardens as far as Port Covington, whereby it is intended to give the Western Maryland terminals 35 feet to the sea. When we deduct these two contracts, we have only to our credit at the first of the year the sum of $118,506—a very small sum, indeed—for the continuation of the work until March of 1921. It is true the contracts which have been allotted will increase largely our efficiency and capacity, but are far short of the completion of our project as outlined by the Board of Engineers and approved by Congress.

Under the bill before us it will be necessary to prevail upon the Secretary of War and the Board of Engineers to apportion a part of the $7,000,000 toward the work at Baltimore. This I hope can be done; this I believe will be done to a limited extent. I had rather have seen the bill, though formed for economy, carry definite appropriations for projects which lack sufficient sums to prosecute the work. I am a great believer in channel and harbor improvements. I feel assured that the great progress which Baltimore has made during the last few years has been largely due to its increased port facilities. To-day our ships travel to every port of the country and ply to the countries of the world. Her name is heralded throughout the land for the progress and prosperity which she is enjoying. Her harbor and channel facilities and likewise her docks and piers should always keep ahead of the demand upon her. If we but do this, big business both in manufacturing and commerce will certainly come to our city. This is what I want to see done, and that is why I call upon Congress to cooperate with us in making this great port appeal even more strongly to the commerce of the world.

Baltimore is the strategic point of the Atlantic coast. It enables commercial and industrial enterprises to defy competition from other seaboard cities. Figure it out from a map. It is the shortest route to southern Europe and Africa. It is closer than any other big Atlantic seaport to Cuba, Jamaica, and South American cities on the east coast. It is 470 miles closer than San Francisco to the city of Valparaiso, Chile, the chief seaport on the west coast of South America. As a distributing center it is closer to the South and the great Middle West than any other Atlantic seaport. It has many steamship lines engaged in trans-Atlantic and other foreign trade. Its numerous local steamship companies operate in the Chesapeake Bay and coastwise trade. It has 6 miles of municipal wharfage front; 32 miles of private wharfage, of which 10 miles are occupied by railroad piers and docks; 1.3 miles by steamship companies; 2 miles by wharf and dock companies; and 19 miles by industrial concerns.

By reason of its geographical location, the city from the very first days of the "iron horse" became a railroad center. It has always been one of the important seaports of the country. That Baltimore lived and flourished may be attributed to its natural maritime advantages. It early became a distributing point for merchandise that came over all seas and from all lands. It sent and still sends back ships burdened with products of every section of this country. Long before steam became the propelling force of commerce Baltimore's supremacy was assured. The Baltimore clipper was famous; it was sailing every sea and was seen in every port.

Mr. Chairman, under my leave to extend, I desire to insert the following extracts showing my position on many vital questions heretofore considered by this body.

[Speech, Jan. 21, 1919.]

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR BILL—EMBASSY BUILDINGS.

The Diplomatic and Consular Service of this Government has played a large part in the conduct of the Great War which has now ended. Other departments of the Government have received vast public attention and large praise from the patriotic people of the land. This service, however, performing its duties without publicity, 3,000 miles or more away, without hope of great reward in a financial sense, has perhaps done more than any other noncombatant branch of the service toward the winning of the war. It has engendered in the hearts of the people of the world friendship and good will toward America. It has conducted its business under adverse circumstances and, while the work has been enormously increased, with efficiency and dispatch, and cost the Government proportionately less than any other branch.

* * * * * * *

In the years to come much will depend upon this service as to what benefits we reap from the Great War which we have fought, both in a friendly and financial sense. Our Government has expended billions of dollars in the preparation and transportation of troops, in the conduct of the war, in the manufacture of munitions, in merchant marine, and in loans to our allies. Whether we shall reap a just reward for these great expenditures, whether the name of our country shall stand aloft in foreign lands, will depend largely upon the men of this service.

* * * * * * *

It is therefore the duty of Congress to recognize in every way possible this particular and unswerving performance of duty. It has always been my desire to see this service well maintained, extended, and every opportunity given for its betterment and enlargement wherever the circumstances demanded. To that end I have always been an advocate of providing in the various countries homes for our embassies, so that they may have permanent quarters, no matter who may occupy them.

[Speech, Jan. 30, 1919.]

AGRICULTURAL BILL—"SAVE THE BABIES."

Mr. Chairman, I want to congratulate the committee for having inserted in the bill this paragraph for the purpose of eradicating tuberculosis in cattle. I have been speaking to this House for some time about the great importance of this subject, and it is inspiring to me that the gentlemen of the committee have seen the vision. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] has done splendid work, along with the chairman of the committee, and also the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN] have done good work.

I believe it is one of the most important items that this Congress will pass at this session or that has been passed at any other session. It provides for safeguarding the purity of those necessities of life which the young consume. I think that when this inspection has been in vogue for a few years, after we have been able to enforce its provisions throughout the country, the inspection will cover all milk products that are consumed by the young—not only milk in its original state but butter and cheese. We will then have been able very largely to eradicate tuberculosis throughout the United States. It is a subject in which everybody is interested. It is a subject in which we are more interested to-day, perhaps, than ever before in the history of the country, because "the boys" are coming home, many of them in a condition which needs absolute attention and pure food, so that they may not be contaminated with any diseases, and particularly with the germs of tuberculosis.

* * * * * * *

I tell you, gentlemen, you are building greater than you realize, and generations yet unborn will rise up to call you blessed for the protection and purification of this all-important food product. Important to the young, when they are unable to care for themselves or look out for their interests; important to the sick, when they must rely upon the good judgment of their fellow beings for those things which they can use for their sustenance; a blessing to old age, when milk and its products perform such an important part of their daily food.

Congress saw the light in the inspection of beef; it has now seen the light and the wisdom in the protection of milk and milk products. I hail the day when the percentage of tuberculosis in cattle will be so low that it will be negligible. It is my proud privilege to again congratulate the committee and the workers of the same for the results they have brought about. It has been a long fight, but what a worthy one.

[Speech, July 18, 1919.]

DAYLIGHT SAVING.

Mr. Chairman, I shall vote against the repeal of the daylight-saving law, and in doing so I voice the sentiments of more than 218,000 people whom I represent in the city of Baltimore. They have tried this law for a year. They find it beneficial. The school-teachers are in favor of it. I find there is a universal sentiment in the city of Baltimore against its repeal.

* * * * * * *

One of the speakers has just told us that there are 12,000,000 people engaged in the agricultural pursuits of the country and 27,000,000 people engaged in the industrial pursuits. Is not this great number of people, more than doubling the 12,000,000, entitled to some consideration in this matter?

Take the lives of those engaged in agricultural pursuits. They live in the fresh air and sunshine of the country, amid the trees and flowers, and those things which make for health and comfort; their life is one in the open, fresh air and the beautiful sunshine—two ingredients which physicians tell us are more health-giving than all the medicines we could take. Their food is fresh from garden and field, and everything which providence in its bountiful nature has provided is at their hand.

The 27,000,000 engaged in industrial pursuits are composed of men, women, and children crowded into the factories and shops of the great cities of the land, toiling behind the machines, sewing in the factories, and performing all the vast services required of them in their line of endeavor. Their life during working hours must necessarily be confined indoors in the crowded portions of our cities, where the heat of the day is reflected by brick and mortar, amid the close air of the factory, and the smoke coming from the great chimneys in their sections. Their only chance to get the fresh air, to enjoy free exercise, and a bit of the country is during their leisure hours when daylight makes it possible.

If you cut off the hour provided under the daylight-saving law in the afternoons they are deprived of just that much daylight in which to enjoy some of the blessings which the agricultural community enjoys all the time. To speak of the golf or tennis player is to speak of only an infinitesimal part of our city people. The men and the women enjoying this pursuit usually control their own time in which to take their exercise or to work; they are not confined to the long hours and the arduous work of those engaged in the industrial pursuits.

I speak for the laboring men, the women, and the children who find, by virtue of this law, they can get into the great parks and recreation centers of our cities to enjoy a little pleasure during daylight when their work has ended, the toiling masses of our people who are entitled to our attention. To go through my city after working hours one beholds in that section where live those engaged in these pursuits thousands of men, women, and children sitting upon the doorsteps, parading in the parks, playing baseball or some other game in which they are interested. It has meant much to these people, and to deprive them of it would be a great handicap.

I realize from what has been said that the farmer is somewhat inconvenienced by virtue of this law, but from my personal observation of the farmers of my State I can not see where it has been very harmful to them. Let them practice a little Christianity; let them remember their brethren engaged in the cities who are the purchasers and consumers of the products which they produce.

[Speech, July 18, 1919.]

MINIMUM-WAGE BILL.

Mr. Speaker, the bill which is before us to-day, known as the minimum-wage bill (H. R. 5726), has been before Congress for several years. At the time it was first introduced $3 per day as a minimum wage seemed to many persons rather high, but since that time there has been such a change come over the world by virtue of the Great War we have just finished, the consequence of which has been the increase in the cost of everything necessary for our livelihood, and particularly the increased cost of food and clothing.

The purchasing power of money has been so largely decreased that when we speak of $3 per day as a minimum wage for our Federal employees we are then scarcely giving them a living wage. Men in the ordinary walks of life employed by firms and corporations, especially in the large cities, are receiving far more money than the minimum wage allowed in this bill.

I am heartily in favor of the passage of the bill so that the Government at least may set an example before the employers of the country as to what is fair and just for those whom they employ. The laboring men of our country have long been neglected, and especially is this so of those receiving regular salaries. Mechanics, artisans, and others in the various occupations have had their wages increased several times. Railroad employees and men employed by the large steamship companies and other transportation individuals and corporations are all paying their men very largely increased wages and salaries. The salaried men and largely the Government employees have been caught between the rising prices of everything necessary for their livelihood and the stationary salary fixed many years ago. It has been impossible for them to maintain themselves and families, and the consequence is that while the men formerly were able to support their families, it is now necessary that every boy and girl as soon as they are old enough, are compelled to seek positions in order to maintain the family exchequer and to properly live. Where the increase in prices will cease certainly no one knows at this time.

Certainly, this House and the Members of this Congress are disposed to give the postal men and the various other employees of this Government fair treatment. We realize the decreased purchasing power of money. We realize that by virtue of this prices are soaring, and no man can tell the end. This House does well, therefore, in giving immediate attention to this all-important measure, and it is my sincere hope and that of my colleague that the Senate will not hesitate or delay in its prompt passage, which will surely receive the approval of the President.

[Speech, Oct. 18, 1919.]

NATIONAL BUDGET.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the passage of this bill creating a national budget system and an independent audit of Government accounts. I feel that the system under which we are now operating is both antiquated and extravagant. The gentleman who has just preceded me has well said it is too hard to get up steam, it takes too much coal in the shape of money, too much fuel, and too many people to shovel it in.

* * * * * * *

The people through this budget will know exactly what the entire cost of the Government is to be for the next fiscal year, just as soon as it is transmitted by the President, and will have ample time to study and approve or disapprove the various items.

* * * * * * *

I believe if we can concentrate public attention on the national budget when it is so framed, not as the estimate of one department but the estimates of all the departments, if we can throw the calcium light of public attention on the budget when sent down by the President, it will not only reduce the expenses of this Government, but it will reduce the responsibility of Congress, and it will largely reduce the criticisms of Congress which it has not merited.

* * * * * * *

The public should more closely scrutinize the departmental items, see to the elimination of all waste, whether it be by excess expenditures for material or for an overabundant list of employees; the latter seems at this time to be the principal waste and extravagance of our various departments. I do not criticize the departments too strongly, nor do I blame employees. I realize that during the war vast numbers of employees were taken on, and that it is difficult to decrease and unusually hard upon the employee who is dropped from the Government pay roll. The American people will, however, sooner or later demand reduction. It will become the great issue before the American people sooner or later—and the "later" is not far distant—excess costs and excess employees must go, not perhaps at the sole demand of Congress, but the demand of a heavily taxed people, who will rise up and demand retrenchment in every department and every branch of Government.

* * * * * * *

When we consider the changes which have taken place in the revenues and expenditures of the Government we must naturally understand that a system which perhaps cared for the country moderately well in the early days could not take care of present conditions. It could not be expanded correctly for such vast bookkeeping and accounting.

There was a time when the larger portion of our revenues was derived from the tariff and from the internal-revenue tax on liquors and tobacco. During 52 years prior to 1917 there had been only something over $600,000,000 collected from direct taxes, and that from but few people. In the year 1909, 52,498 corporations in the United States made tax returns showing taxable income, while in 1917, 232,000 made returns. During the calendar year of 1913, 357,598 persons made individual income-tax returns, and for the year 1917 this was increased to 3,472,890.

Can you imagine any private corporation with its book accounts so vastly increased adhering to an old system which had long since become obsolete?

In 1914 we expended something over $1,025,000,000, while for 1919 it is estimated that it will take to settle our obligations for the war and run the Government something around eleven billions. This, of course, including obligations created during the war period for which we must now pay.

* * * * * * *

So long as the people paid their taxes indirectly through a tariff and an internal revenue on certain articles of luxury they did not much concern themselves, but now, when taxation is heavy and the taxgatherer delves into a man's business affairs, when taxation burdens his livelihood, when he is asked all manner of question as to his business, his profits, and his expenditures, when it affects the very livelihood of his family and education of his children, we can readily understand why the people become more interested in national legislation, in appropriations, and in revenues. The people of this country do not object to the payment of taxes, but they want a dollar in service or in material for every dollar of taxes they pay, and I believe by this system we will be able to materially help them in that respect.

* * * * * * *

This budget system of the National Government wil not alone serve for the reduction of appropriations and lessening of taxation, but it will serve as a strong adjunct to the Government in that it will provide information for the use of Congress and the various departments, and will always have at hand a vast fund of information for not alone the guidance of the President himself but for Congress and the departments as well. There will be at hand information as to the condition of the Treasury and the opinion of the President as to the needs of the Government for the ensuing fiscal year. [Applause.]

[Speech, Oct. 22, 1919.]

INTERNATIONAL COMMUNICATIONS—APPOINTING POWER.

I rise particularly to deplore the fact that the Foreign Affairs Committee, which during my membership thereof for the past nine years, under the administrations of President Taft and of President Wilson, has always eschewed politics in its deliberations; that you should at this time endeavor to reflect upon the appointing power of the Nation in these matters, when we are just emerging from the greatest war which the world has ever known. It is bad enough to consider matters from a political standpoint upon the floor of this House when it is essential to do so, or beneficial to the respective political parties to do so, but the voters will not approve of it in international matters, and it will prove a boomerang to you Republicans.

Throughout this broad land of ours there is unrest, unsettled conditions; money interests, business interests, and labor interests are wondering when we shall again reach a peaceful basis in fact as well as in law. Here in this House upon the least provocation you intrude political questions. You take a political view of matters which should be dealt with solely from a business and reconstruction standpoint. You delay action by long debates upon questions of which the people are well informed while the conditions of the country demand action.

I remember distinctly when the Speaker of this House [Mr. GILLETT] argued that the President should call an extra session of Congress by April 1 for the solution of weighty problems upon which will depend our industrial prosperity. He is from an industrial section and knew whereof he spoke. He said the factories of the United States are halting because of the uncertainty of the future and to revive that condition would be the first task of the new Congress. He said, "I believe it will be done with wisdom and fearlessness, and that its results will command the approval and confidence of the American people." Your floor leader, Mr. MONDELL, announced on March 4 that the Republicans were ready for the extra session; that appropriations would first be taken up; then would come railroad and shipping legislation; that water-power, coal, and oil leasing, and a variety of other measures for the industrial life of the Nation would be enacted.

I ask you to-day, Where, oh, where is this railroad legislation upon which the President asked action by Congress about a year ago? Where are those measures which were to be made with "wisdom and fearlessness and receive the commendation of the American people"? Where is the shipping legislation or the water-power, coal, and oil-leasing bills? We have spent a very considerable time upon investigations of this, that, and the other; what benefit has been derived from it except to establish in the minds of the American people that through the lavish expenditure of money and the forcing of war work we reached Europe in time with two millions of men to save the war for the Allies?

* * * * * * *

I say these things, Mr. Speaker, to show you and to demonstrate the fact that Congress has abundance of work to perform, both in the House and Senate; that the Senate is overcrowded and will find it difficult to take on further operations. To add to the political harangue of this House and additional work to the Senate, it is proposed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs that we shall, by the amendment submitted, direct that the appointment of the members of this international conference should be ratified by the Senate. The appointment of such commissioners has almost universally been left to the Executive, where the Constitution vested it. Never in the history of our country has a Congress demanded that appointments of this nature first receive the sanction of the Senate. Presidents have in some instances voluntarily submitted them to the Senate, but never has Congress required it to be done.

[Speech, Nov. 7, 1919.]

AMENDMENT TO FEDERAL RESERVE ACT—FOREIGN FINANCIAL SYSTEM.

Mr. Chairman, I am particularly anxious to see a strong, virile American banking system established throughout the world. I do not want any system, however, established in which we have not every confidence and are willing to give it the same degree of support and assistance which we now give to our national banking institutions in the way of inspection and other safeguards which are thrown around their operations.

* * * * * * *

This Government has no right and Congress has no justification in organizing anything in the way of a financial system to which it is not willing to give not alone its name but likewise its unqualified supervision.

* * * * * * *

I want to see the prowess of America established in financial matters in all the great centers of the globe. Her banking institutions and her business facilities should be as well known as the great feats performed by our soldiers and sailors in the late war. The people expect much of this country, rich in natural resources and vast wealth, rich in energy and perseverance, a people who do things and do them quickly. I am glad to see that at last we are providing some financial system by which people may transact financial matters with American institutions in foreign lands.

[Speech, Nov. 15, 1919.]

RAILROAD BILL—TERMINAL FACILITIES.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I objected to the withdrawal of the amendment because I think it is a matter of great importance to the cities along the Atlantic seaboard and the cities in the Middle West. I have in mind especially the situation between the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad and the Pennsylvania Railroad entering the city of New York. We all know there has been many millions of dollars expended at the terminal in New York by the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. That the expense of upkeep and the necessary overhead charges must be borne by the people traveling the Pennsylvania Railroad unless other roads are admitted to this terminal.

* * * * * * *

I do not think we should take any chance of this right being withdrawn. It would injure the convenience of the people along this whole section, who now have two roads by which they can enter the center of New York, whereas if that right is withdrawn there will be but one road. It doubles the convenience as it is now. It lessens the great expense to the Pennsylvania Railroad, and it is of inestimable benefit to all travelers, in that it gives them double facilities to enter the great metropolis of this country, and obivates the inconvenience of the ferry. I therefore object, and I think the amendment ought to be adopted. We ought to safeguard the situation, if we can do it, at this time. This is not the time to take any chances with a situation which means so much to the people.

* * * * * * *

The citizens of this country have come to realize that, no matter through what system a railroad is built or a great terminal constructed, the final payment and continual expense rests upon the shoulders of those who travel, and of all the other people by virtue of freight rates for the necessities of life and the comforts, convenience, and success of the entire citizenship of the land.

Vast sums of money have been expended in this country not alone in duplicating terminal facilities, depots, and stations in various towns and cities of the land, but in constructing parallel lines between certain points. I am glad this matter of construction of new lines has been left largely to the Interstate Commerce Commission. It has often occurred that the construction of an additional line which was unnecessary has rather injured the public than benefited it, because it results often in two weak and inefficient lines rather than one strong line. It places the burden upon the public to maintain two lines, with all the duplication of officials, employees, stations, and other adjuncts and necessities of a railroad system, instead of one.

Federal control became a necessity owing to the war. It has, like all war-time activities, resulted in a great burden to the people; but many things have grown out of the situation and out of this control from which lessons for the future can be learned and the defects of the old system be remedied. The railroad systems of the country constitute the very lifeblood of the Nation; they are the trade arteries of the land; and the greater ease and facility by which they are operated, the satisfaction and prosperity of their employees, and their financial soundness means prosperity to the entire country.

The amendment was one prohibiting the withdrawal of joint terminal facilities.

[Speech, Nov. 8, 1919.]

MERCHANT MARINE—BALTIMORE HARBOR.

Mr. Chairman, I am very much impressed by the statement of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] in reference to terminal facilities. It seems to me that one of the great necessities for the success of the merchant marine is terminal facilities and not too much congestion of the shipping in any one port along the seaboard. We all know that the port of New York has been so congested for several years that it has been almost impossible to do business there with any great economy, that the port of Philadelphia has been very much congested, and that the port of Baltimore has had a tremendous increase of shipping and is rapidly becoming like the other ports. New York and Philadelphia have received large appropriations, owing to the war. Baltimore has received some very good appropriations, but we must have a channel of 40 feet and still wider channels. We are the only city along the Atlantic outside of New York having an unobstructed channel of 35 feet up to the piers, but even this is not sufficient, and more money must be expended with us.

What we must certainly do is not alone to say that we want a merchant marine, which I believe all of us favor on some basis. Some favor a subsidy, some Government ownership, and some semi-Government ownership, but all favor a merchant marine. It is highly essential that we should at the same time develop our port facilities and that there should not be continuous objection every time the river and harbor bill is reported to this House, because it appropriates money along the Atlantic seaboard or along the Pacific coast for the development of our channels and waterways.

* * * * * * *

That, with the additional elevators which we have, gives a capacity of 10,000,000 bushels of grain. Baltimore has 18 miles of water front suitable for docking purposes, including 6¾ miles in the main inner harbor, 3½ miles on the middle branch within technical city limits, and at least 8 miles more adjacent to the city limits. It has 160 wharves in the main harbor with 145,700—say 27¾ miles frontage of wharf room. Adding this amount of wharf frontage to the other water front of the Patapsco River and its tributaries gives a total of 120 miles water front, developed and undeveloped. Of this wharfage the city owns 13 piers with a wharf frontage of 26,385 feet—5 miles.

The port facilities, the quick operation of ships, the quick loading and accommodation at the various ports are highly essential to the success of any merchant marine which we may establish.

* * * * * * *

The water is the theater of activity of many of our people, and many of those now living can remember the day when the Chesapeake was dotted with its white fleets of clipper ships whose prowess and reputation made the name of Baltimore famous throughout the world.

* * * * * * *

Richard Henry Dana, jr., in that splendid work of his, "Two Years Before the Mast," refers to the good ship Ann McKim, of Baltimore, as being one of the fastest and best-sailing merchantmen on the Pacific coast. Thus, even while Baltimore was in her infancy, her clipper ships were carrying her goods and making her products known to the people of distant lands.

* * * * * * *

It is invigorating to know that after the lapse of so many years during which American ships were seldom seen in the ports of the world, and the American flag was seen seldom on anything except its warships, to-day we have again entered upon a vast shipbuilding program. That America to-day has more ship workers, more shipyards, more shipways, more vessels under construction, and is turning them out more rapidly and in greater number than now issue from all the shipyards of the world. We are the premier shipbuilding Nation of the entire world, and this we have attained in one gigantic stride since the beginning of the war.

Up to the outbreak of the World War we had only 15 vesels of 1,000 tons engaged in overseas trade. To-day the American flag floats from 1,280 ocean-going steamships, 1,107 of which have been built by the United States Shipping Board within the last two years. In June, 1914, the total gross tonnage under the American flag, including coastwise shipping and the freight operating on the Great Lakes, was 4,287,000 tons, while in June, 1919, its gross tonnage was 11,983,000, an increase of 278 per cent, and this chiefly in ocean-going vessels. To-day the steam tonnage of America sailing under Old Glory is 24.8 per cent of the steam tonnage of the world. Certainly this is a splendid record, and one of which the public generally should feel most proud.

* * * * * * *

A moment's reflection will bring home to anyone considering the subject how independent the United States is when building for its own shipping. Thousands of miles of sea separate us from the great shipyards of Europe. It is natural therefore that we should depend on ourselves for our ships and that we should build these ships adapted to our own needs. It is a historical fact that the shipbuilding nations have ever been the shipowning nations, and that nations without shipbuilders are nations without ships and without trades of their own. To neglect to build our own ships is to neglect to own the ships in which our commerce is carried. To neglect to own the ships in which we carry our commerce is to attempt to compete with our rivals for that commerce under conditions most unfair. The successful commercial nations of the past have been those nations who have built their own ships and have carried their commerce in these ships to the nations of the earth. To endeavor to build up a great State from commerce without controlling the vessels of commerce is a proposition as impossible as that to set aside the laws of gravitation.

The wisdom of the policy of our forefathers in encouraging building and the maintenance of an adequate merchant marine has been demonstrated time and again. We are told that under their farseeing policy of encouagement eligible farms become town sites, land increased in value, and trade and industry everywhere felt the quickening impulse of foreign trade. Every interest in the country was benefited by the policy adopted which gave to our country the business of shipbuilding; of getting ship timber; of building dry docks and repairing vesels; of making spars, blocks, and pumps; of fitting, rigging, and of sailmaking; of making anchors and chains, windlasses and capstans; of building boats and making oars; of equipping and outfitting vessels; of supplying provisions and clothing for crews; and many other incidental trades.

* * * * * * *

In conclusion let me say that the American people are to be highly congratulated, and those who have had the building of the ships should be highly pleased that America has again taken her place in the commerce of the world, not alone in vast trade but in hauling her products to the ports of the countries in American-built ships, laden with American goods, and manned by American crews; that they will invade every ocean and sea and every port of commecial size; that Baltimore, one of the largest shipbuilding ports along the seaboard, is again taking its part in this great enterprise, and her ships are becoming as well known as her clipper ships of old.

[Speech, Dec. 12, 1919.]

CAMP HOLABIRD.

Mr. Chairman, I rise to inform the House of Camp Holabird, Md., perhaps the greatest motor-truck camp in the world, certainly the largest automobile repair shop in existence. Camp Jesup, at Atlanta, Ga., and Camp Normoyle, at San Antonio, Tex., are about two-thirds the size of Camp Holabird, while Camp Boyd, on the reservation of El Paso, is about one-third the size.

According to the testimony of Gen. Drake, there are 80 officers and 2,000 employees at Camp Holabird. It is located about 4 miles from the old city limits of Baltimore, on Colgate Creek; has large truck facilities and railroad connections. You will see, therefore, that it is admirably located from every economic point of view, being in close proximity to a city of 700,000 people, with its vast number of mechanics, having railroad and water connections which lead to all parts of the country and to every country of the globe.

There have been purchased at Camp Holabird 97.74 acres of land, costing $340,000, and upon construction, $4,933,000, making total expenditure of $5,273,000. I am thankful to say that this bill provides for the completion of the purchase of land at that camp, 43.53 acres having already been contracted for, the price agreed upon, and the people promised their money. They have been waiting for a long time for the payment, and the $140,000 which the committee gives under this bill will allow the Government to settle with these people who have long since parted with their property in the hope of prompt payment. We are very thankful that the committee has granted this appropriation. We feel that it is not alone the appropriation that is granted, but that the appropriation signifies that the camp has been adopted for continuation; that we shall look forward to great work of the Government in that section. I say we are pleased with this. We congratulate the committee upon its good judgment, and we know all Baltimoreans are thanking them for having given them their attention in this bill.

We must realize that the Government having a vast number of automobiles and trucks in its service ought to have the very best equipped and most up-to-date repair shop that can be procured; its property ought to be sheltered and cared for; its railroad facilities and railroad storage ought to be ample in order to be economical and efficient. It is therefore regretted that the committee has not seen its way clear to make these two appropriations.

Certainly Baltimore, with its close proximity to the West, the coal and iron fields of the country and the cheap railroad rates, the doorway to the Southland, and with a harbor second alone to that of New York, is an admirable location for such a camp. That it should be fostered and enlarged as requirements demand is self-evident.

I sincerely hope that this camp, which has performed such a valuable service in salvaging and handling automobiles and trucks and has meant such a vast saving to the Government, should be dealt with liberally and well, so that its usefulness may become greater and more abundant as the demands upon its capacity require.

[Speech, Jan. 10, 1920.]

POSTAL BILL.

Mr. Chairman, I was particularly gratified with the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. I know that he has been a constant student on postal matters and a great friend of the postal employees. I know it is largely through his influence and work that salaries have been increased and that these men are now or will shortly be paid sufficient remuneration upon which to live. I am particularly gratified with the fact that Baltimore has such a splendid service, such a fine personnel, both in its clerks, its letter carriers, and the entire force of that city. My great wonderment is the fact that they are able to carry on the work as efficiently as they do in the face of the crowded condition of our post office. Many of our men are crowded into a basement, working with a poor light—mostly artificial light—endeavoring to carry on the postal work of the city that has grown to tremendous proportions, now having something over 700,000 inhabitants.

Since the Postal Service has been inaugurated and the work of the postal department has grown so enormously, it seems to me that Congress should undertake to get enlarged accommodations throughout the country. I know that in many of the post offices a great deal of space has been sacrificed to architectural effect. We might have had more light if we had had less architecture, and the result is that now we have very crowded conditions, and that obtains throughout the land.

I rise particularly to call attention of the House to the fact that if the other cities are crowded as Baltimore is crowded in its postal building, then certainly something should be done to enlarge the facilities for carrying on this work. I would like to see post offices constructed or enlarged throughout the country along the same line that a business man would enlarge his business buildings. We do not find the business interests of the country trying to carry on a tremendously increased business in a small structure, but we find them enlarging their business buildings so that they may carry on the enlarged business, and that should be the case with the Post Office Department. I think we should undertake the construction of new postal buildings wherever they are necessary. For myself I should like to see the buildings for separate cities considered in separate bills, so that each city could go before the committee and present its necessities and then have the House act upon those bills. Something must be done. It is not just, it is not fair, it is not reasonable to expect these men to carry on this great work in the crowded conditions we find everywhere, using the artificial light that must be used.

I hope this Congress will take up the subject and force it to a conclusion, so that we may soon find ourselves with better facilities for carrying on this tremendous work, which means something to practically everyone in the land, rich or poor, for everyone enjoys the postal facilities of the country. The post office is their pride, it is the one thing they need every day, and it is the one thing which should be equipped to the very highest point of efficiency.

[Speech, May 18, 1914.]

DUTY OF GOVERNMENT IN PROTECTING AND DEVELOPING SEA FOOD—IMPORTANCE OF SEA FOOD IN OUR DIET.

To many who have given little or no thought to the subject it may come as a surprise when I tell you that of our estimated population of 98,000,000 people in this country at least 3,000,000 may be safely said to derive their living from pursuits or business relating directly or indirectly to our sea-food life. Consider for a moment this vast number, and it will occur to you that they constitute an army more numerous than all those engaged in our Civil War. Then pause to consider the millions of people to whose diet the work of these 3,000,000 contribute and you will have some idea of the vast extent of this subject.

CONSERVATION OF OUR FOOD FISH.

Waste almost criminal in its character has distinguished the American people in the treatment of their food fish. A century ago the waters of almost every flowing stream in our country were alive with a variety of fish whose flesh offered delicious edible nourishment. Little more than a hundred years have passed and we are beginning to suffer the consequences of our profligacy toward this valuable gift of nature. The run of fish in our rivers has decreased from 20 to 80 per cent, and in some rivers they are on the verge of extermination. Even in those estuaries of the ocean whose supplies of marine life seemed inexhaustible this depletion is nearly on a par with that which has taken place in our rivers. That this depletion foreshadows eventual extinction is only too plainly apparent. The necessity for immediate conservation is upon us, and those who have given attention and study to the subject have been brought to realize that no measure can be enacted fully protective unless it be one of national scope. The great estuaries of the ocean and the waters which empty into them flow within the jurisdiction of two or more States; hence any effort to control these waters through the laws of one State alone is insufficient to meet the requirements of the situation.

* * * * * * *

Let me make plain at the outset of these remarks that my interest in the subject is not from the viewpoint of the fisherman-sportsman. I am not a member of any game or sportsmen's club, and I do not recall that within the past 15 years I have caught a fish or attempted to catch one. My whole interest in the question is from the side of the consumer and the commercial fisherman. To me it is purely an economic proposition. My study of the subject has brought clearly to me the realization that unless we institute some radical change in our present policy but a few years will intervene between now and the day when the fish-consuming public will be entirtly deprived of one of its important sources of food and the commercial fisherman will find his business has vanished.

* * * * * * *

On the upper waters of the Potomac the fishermen complain that their catch is steadily diminishing year by year. The causes for this diminution may be readily found in the vast network of seines which extend from the Virginia shores of the Bay athwart the path usually followed by fish coming in from the sea and which catch and prevent the fish in the course they would follow up the river. Four or five years ago the State of Virginia licensed approximately 2,500 of these line nets. To-day, with the quantity of fish much reduced, Virginia is licensing over 4,000 of them. If the fish are fortunate enough to escape the network of seines which impede their progress, they have yet to get by the thousands of gill and pound nets that beset them at almost every mile of their progress up the bay to the river.

As an illustration of how great has been the decrease in the catch of shad and herring, I call your attention to the statement of Neitzy Bros., of Washington, D. C., who report that in 1909 they caught 9,000 shad and 1,400,000 herring. In 1813 their catch had dwindled to 700 shad and 60,000 herring.

Another evidence of this depletion in the catch of shad was presented by a fisherman at the head of the bay, in the Susquehanna River, who shows that in 1882 he caught 19,000 shad, in 1883 only 17,000, and in 1912 his catch had dwindled to 7,200.

In 1909 the catch of shad in the State of Virginia was nearly 7,500,000 pounds, while in 1913 it was less than 3,000,000 pounds. In Maryland, in 1890, they got a catch of over 18,000,000 pounds; in 1900 their catch was reduced to a little over 3,000,000 pounds, while in 1912 the catch was less than 2,000,000 pounds. In other words, during a period of 25 years the catch fell off to 5,000,000 pounds.

* * * * * * *

The use of food fish for fertilizer purposes has resulted in intense fishing, an increase in the number of line nets and their extension farther into the water, with the consequent effect of impeding the fish in their migrations up the river. This wholesale taking has been felt with severity on the upper waters, and for example I quote you the case of a firm of old and experienced fishermen in the Potomac River, whose catch of herring for the entire season of 1913 was less than their catch for one day 10 years before.

* * * * * * *

I hold that these great, bountiful gifts of nature were bestowed for our use and profit, to be handled wisely and frugally. We are at liberty to use all that we require, but beyond that it is our duty to preserve the remainder for the generations to come. Providence has made the living the trustees of this vast natural wealth, charging them with the duty of holding it for posterity. We have no right to deprive those yet unborn of their birthright as, under our present practices of extravagance and folly, we are doing. It is a solemn, sacred duty we owe to humanity to use this trust economically and transmit it unimpaired to the future. Let us not forget that it is easier to destroy than to build; that the damage of a few moments often can not be repaired in years, sometimes in centuries. The most shameful reflection we can have upon our memory, the greatest monument to our profligacy we can erect, is that which, under our present policy, we are building in robbing and ravishing the waters of our land of the bountiful supply of fish with which an all-wise nature endowed them.

[Speech, Dec. 22, 1914.]

PROHIBITION AMENDMENT—LET THE PEOPLE RULE.

I do not believe the liquor question can be solved by an amendment to the Constitution which could be adopted by a minority of the people of the land through their legislative bodies. In the adoption of a constitutional amendment each State, through its legislature, has the same voting power. For instance, the State of Delaware, with its 203,000 people, would have the same power in the adoption of this amendment as the State of New York, with its 8,000,000. Ten States of the Union might vote against the adoption, and yet the balance of the States could enact it. There are 10 States of the Union which contain more than half the population, and their votes might be counted against the amendment, and yet the balance of the States, representing a minority of the people, could enact it.

We have been urging "Let the people rule," and only lately we finished a campaign in which we claimed we had performed a great service to the American people by taking from the legislatures of the several States the naming of United States Senators and vesting their election in the people themselves. Shall we now do diametrically opposite and take from the people local self-government in the control of their liquor traffic, through their police power, and vest that power in the hands of the United States Government? * * * Shall we so far forget the past as to approve an amendment which in its powers and inquisitorial nature is a close parallel to the force bill?

Thousands of Federal employees would be necessary for its enforcement, expense unlimited, and trouble and annoyance untold.

I prefer to leave its solution to the people of the States and of those localities which desire it. Let good men, above reproach, who have the confidence of the community, be intrusted with the execution of the liquor laws, and with public sentiment back of them upholding and aiding in the work we will get the best results. In my judgment this is the only way to deal effectively with this important question.

You can never enforce a law of this character unless you have public sentiment behind it. You can never legislate people good. They must be trained and educated so. It has been demonstrated time and again that you seldom convict a man before a jury of 12 of his peers if the law under which he is indicted is in conflict with the public sentiment of his community. We can, therefore, readily see how difficult it would be to enforce such a law against the will of the people of a State which had voted against the adoption of the amendment and in which public sentiment opposed its enforcement.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the bill now before us will provide with the sums available, unexpended and unobligated, for all of the rivers and harbors in the country where there is real water and real commerce. The only localities that will not be taken care of are the dry creeks that need a little sprinkling, and the rivers here and there that carry no commerce.

Mr. SMALL. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. SMALL. Where did the gentleman get authority for his statement that $7,000,000 for further improvement will comply with the demands of the country? Did he get it from the War Department?

Mr. MONDELL. There is now on hand and available for the various improvement projects a sum equal to the average expenditure on those projects for the last five years.

Mr. SMALL. Is the gentleman aware——

Mr. MONDELL. And at this time, in the present condition of the Treasury, if any man insists that we should spend more money on these projects than we have been spending on the average for the last five years, he has not, in my opinion, a due regard for his country's Treasury and its finances.

Mr. SMALL. May I ask the gentleman why he is in favor of spending $7,000,000 for further improvements?

Mr. MONDELL. I am in favor of spending $7,000,000 because this committee, after very careful consideration of every item, came to the conclusion that in order to adequately and properly care for the needs of commerce, where there is commerce, they should grant a sum of $7,000,000 in addition to the sums now available for the various projects. In my opinion, after having given the matter consideration, I believe the sum they provided is adequate, and will provide for the continuation of work as rapidly as it can properly be carried on under present conditions, in all of the important harbors and on all of the important rivers of the country bearing commerce.

Now, that being the case, a man is simply after "pork," local indefensible "pork," when he asks for more than that. Here is an opportunity to prove that we believe in economy, economy without parsimony, economy that cares for the commerce of the country, and economy that keeps going the river and harbor enterprises and activities of the Nation where needed and as rapidly as they can be economically carried forward under present existing conditions.

There will be no letting up on the prosecution of the work where needed. I live in a country that never benefits by river and harbor bills, but I have generally voted for river and harbor appropriations. And I am for this bill, because it is a logical bill; because it provides for the real needs of the country and carries no item of "pork."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I shall consume one minute, in reply to the distinguished gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for one minute.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman says that this bill is "logical," and yet it has not the approval of the engineers of the War Department, upon whose judgment the estimates of appropriations are based. They say that this $7,000,000 is not sufficient; that it will result in loss and waste, and will not subserve the best interests of the country. And yet the distinguished gentleman from Wyoming proposes—and I ask his attention—to leave to those same engineers the discretion of expending this $7,000,000.

Upon which occasion does he trust their judgment? Does he trust their judgment now, or in the future, when it comes to the expenditure? Apparently he does not trust them to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has occupied one minute. The Chair presumes he wished to be notified.

Mr. SMALL. I will yield to the gentleman from Wyoming if he wishes to ask me a question.

Mr. MONDELL. The present administration of the Government is in the hands of the party to which the gentleman belongs. I am willing to intrust to them the expenditure of this money. Is the gentleman willing to intrust to them the expenditure of this money?

Mr. SMALL. Oh, that is begging the question. The gentleman is not willing to trust them in the estimates that are necessary to-day, and yet he is willing to trust them, five or six months from now, to select the projects and allot the $7,000,000. The gentleman's position is inconsistent.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman believe that the engineers will allot any of this sum where there is no commerce and no urgent need?

Mr. SMALL. I do not believe they will. They never have done so heretofore.

Mr. MONDELL. Then, what is the gentleman's complaint?

Mr. SMALL. Oh, there is a wide difference between submitting estimates for future work and selecting hereafter projects to which they will allot this lump-sum appropriation. I say it is the function of Congress to select the projects to be improved and to get the best judgment of the engineers as to the amount to be appropriated. That is what we propose to do in this motion to recommit.

What the gentleman intended to do when he rose was to crack the party whip, to admonish men on his side to be regular and stand by the steering committee. I am sorry that for the first time in many years there is sought to be injected politics into the river and harbor bill. It is unfortunate for the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used three minutes.

Mr. SMALL. I reserve the remainder of my time. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has nine minutes.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. We have only one more speech on this side.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDUFFIE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I present an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McDUFFIE: Strike out all of section 1 after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the sum of $25,000,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to be immediately available and to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers, for the preservation and maintenance of existing river and harbor work and for the prosecution of such projects heretofore authorized as may be most desirable in the interest of commerce and navigation: Provided, That allotments from the amount hereby appropriated shall be made by the Secretary of War upon the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers: And provided further, That at the beginning of the first session of the Sixty-sixth Congress a special report shall be made to Congress by the Secretary of War, showing the amount allotted under this appropriation for each work for improvement or maintenance."

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, while it may appear presumptuous on my part to even make suggestions, to say nothing of criticizing the great Rivers and Harbors Committee, yet I can not remain silent and fail to raise my voice in solemn protest against this piece of legislation in its present form.

I am not unmindful of the burden resting upon this Congress, and especially those committees which have to do with appropriations, in their efforts to curb the expenditure of the people's money. I realize you have no easy task, and I, like all good Democrats, wish to join you in your efforts for economy, but I am not willing to join you in the exercise of such economy, such unbusinesslike and wasteful economy, as you have shown in this legislation.

It is true that the overburdened taxpayer of this Government is looking to Congress to-day for the practice of economy. The public is groaning underneath the high cost of living and the most burdensome taxation the people have ever had in my recollection. And, while they are calling upon us for economy, they are expecting us to adopt the policy of real, genuine economy, for economy's sake, and not for the sake of politics. And may I be pardoned for saying that, in my judgment, the development of the transportation systems, both rail and water, in these United States is more important to-day to the people of the American Republic than the success of the Republican Party.

When the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] asked to know who demanded this bill in its present form he was told by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] that the taxpayers of this country were demanding economy, and for that reason the Rivers and Harbors Committee had seen fit to cut the appropriations necessary, and estimated to be necessary by the Chief of the Engineers, from $43,000,000 to $12,000,000. Oh, taxpayer, what crimes are committed in thy name! Let me remind the committee that some of the taxpayers of this country live in New York and enjoy the advantages of that wonderful harbor and the rivers of that great State; some of the taxpayers live within the Mississippi Valley, the vast territory between the Alleghanies and the Rocky Mountains, that part of the Union which, with the Gulf States, produces more food and raiment for mankind than any other section; some of the taxpayers of this country live on the Atlantic seaboard and some on the Pacific coast; some of the taxpayers live on the Gulf coast and along the great Warrior River system, at Mobile, New Orleans, and Galveston—all these are overburdened taxpayers. Their money goes into the Treasury of the United States, and these taxpayers, these people, are demanding of this Congress that they do not neglect nor fail to develop the wonderful natural advantages with which God Almighty has blessed this great country.

Transportation is one of the greatest questions confronting the American people. Everyone is reminded of the congestion of the traffic even to-day and the scarcity of railroad equipment, the inability of the railroads to handle all the commerce of the Nation. It has been shown that, according to the census of 1916, 275,000,000 tons of traffic was water borne; something over $7,000,000,000 worth of commerce. Would you hamper the means by which this vast amount of tonnage is handled? Suppose, if you please, that it were dumped upon the railroad lines of this country in their already congested and depleted condition. Do you comprehend the distressing conditions that would follow? Is it economy to let dredges and machinery remain idle and deteriorate? Is it economy to permit river channels and harbors to so fill until much work will have to be done all over again?

Gentlemen have stood upon this floor and repeatedly proclaimed that this $12,000,000 carried in this bill, to be expended under the supervision of the engineers, by the Secretary of War, is ample to continue existing projects in keeping with the needs of commerce, and yet, from the report of the engineers and according to a statement to me of Col. Harry Taylor, Acting Chief of Engineers of the War Department, the $7,000,000 you provide for improvements is largely inadequate and will greatly hamper the improvement of existing projects, while the five millions you provide in this bill for maintenance is barely enough to tide over until March, 1921. Who knows best about this—Col. Taylor, who has spent years and years of his life in the engineering work and in caring for the rivers and harbors of the country, or the members of this committee? What sort of economy is it that prompts a party to give to the railroads of this country $1,000,000,000, yet deny to the rivers and harbors of the Government $25,000,000?

Under the provisions of the amendment which I have just offered, it is provided that $25,000,000 be appropriated for the improvement of existing projects and their maintenance. According to the estimates of the Engineers' Office, $19,500,000 is absolutely necessary to carry on the improvement of existing projects, while $5,000,000 they say is hardly enough to maintain the work already done. To this amount I have added one-half a million in order that the engineers may not be hampered in the carrying out of this most useful development.

Personally I much prefer the old way of making appropriations for rivers and harbors; that is, specifying each particular project and naming the amount to be expended thereon. However, the committee has seen fit to make this a lump-sum appropriation of $7,000,000 to cover all of the improvements in these United States, leaving the expenditure of this improvement money to the discretion of the engineers. Therefore I have followed the idea of the committee in this amendment and I would leave the expenditure of these $25,000,000 in the discretion of the engineers, and you will notice that I have not suggested in the amendment how much shall be expended for improvements nor how much for maintenance. I have full faith and confidence in the engineers' office, and believe that they will exercise the proper discretion in the expenditure of this money. They are unquestionably a splendid organization, intelligent men with the good of their country at heart, men who have a pride in this improvement of our rivers and harbors, and I have no hesitancy in saying that I am willing to trust this development to their good judgment. But, gentlemen of the committee, engineers can not build up the rivers and harbors on good judgment and discretion alone. It takes money and a great deal of money. Seven millions of dollars will not carry us over until March, 1921, when we assume that another rivers and harbors bill will have passed. Therefore I beg you to seriously consider this amendment which is offered with a view of appropriating enough money and only enough money to properly and economically take care of this development and maintenance of our rivers and harbors.

I never heard a more fallacious argument in my life than that advanced by some gentleman to-day to the effect that this is no time for the development of water transportation, that we should wait on this matter until times get hard in this country, when people are out of work, and then let the contract. Surely that gentleman has lost sight of the fact that the more people we have at work and the more people who actually work and give value received for their services the more taxes are paid into the Treasury, and therefore the better the condition of the Treasury to stand these expenditures.

Can any member of this committee tell me under this legislation how much money the harbor of New York will receive, or the harbor of Boston? Some harbors of this country have not money available now, as you claim, till further than June 30, 1920. For instance, take the harbor of Mobile, which I have the honor to represent. According to the engineers' estimate there is now on hand available to be expended by June 30, 1920, $402,267.98. The estimated expenditures to carry on the project until June 30, 1921, will take an additional $300,000. After June 30, 1920, is the work on this splendid harbor of Mobile and its maintenance to cease? If not, where will the money come from under this bill? Suppose it is all expended in the harbors of Philadelphia, Norfolk, Boston, New York, or San Francisco; and yet in all these places the work can not be properly carried on under the meager appropriation which you provide in this bill.

It was argued here to-day that no commerce is being carried upon the inland waterways of this country; that the harbors of the country and the inland waterways were all sufficiently developed to take care of the needs of the commerce to-day; that the amount of water-borne commerce of the Government did not justify the expenditure of so much money on the improvement of our waterways. I do not know the conditions all over the country, but I would invite the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to the harbor of Mobile, where to-day we are working upon a 30-foot channel project from the Gulf of Mexico, a distance of 33½ miles through Mobile Bay, to the port of Mobile. There he may see the ships of all nations carrying to all the busy markets of the world the products of American industry. I would invite him to inspect the great river systems, comprising some twelve or fifteen hundred miles, which is carrying to the port of Mobile thousands of tons of steel, iron, coal, cotton, and lumber. The Warrior-Tombigbee system, which taps the rich coal fields of Alabama, which extends even to the steel factories of the great Birmingham district, and which are to-day carrying from that magic city the best steel in the world, made in Birmingham, the Pittsburgh of the South, and which is sent to Mobile, there to be used in the construction of steel ships by the Chickasaw Shipbuilding Co., a subsidiary of the United States Steel Corporation. Surely you gentlemen would not impede or hinder the much needed development in a territory like this. I mention this section of the country, primarily, of course, because it is that part I represent; but I am sure the same argument applies to the Mississippi, Missouri, and Ohio Rivers; the same argument applies to all the harbors of this country. The better your harbors the bigger should be our volume of traffic. No country on earth can boast of such wonderful advantages in the way of inland waterways and harbors as the United States. Shall we adopt a policy of neglect, or is it our duty, Republicans and Democrats, to join hands in making our transportation problems less burdensome by utilizing these God-given arteries of commerce?

Are you gentlemen on the other side, who are going to support this measure because the Republican steering committee has "issued its edict," going back to your constituents at Boston, Philadelphia, New York, and Chicago and say "your dredges are idle, your machinery is deteriorating at great cost to you people, but we voted for this stinting economy so that we could go before the people in the next campaign and say, 'behold, see how we have economized'?"

There is such a thing, in my opinion, as being too economical. There is such a thing, gentlemen of the committee, as being unbusinesslike and wasteful in our efforts to practice economy when it comes to a question of public improvement. I was advised yesterday that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds would not even report a bill for passage at this session of Congress. It is my understanding that this committee would consider and pass upon all matters seeking to provide additional hospital equipment for the returned soldier and sailor. Are these heroes of the late World War to be denied proper and deserving treatment at the hands of Congress because, forsooth, the Republican Party would show to the country a record for economy? Is it the economical "germ" which has gotten into your blood which has thus far prevented action upon more legislation for benefit of the soldier and sailor? Are we to expect that all measures in the future to be passed by this Congress are to bear these same earmarks of economy?

Yes; the people of this Government are demanding wise economy, but remember, gentlemen, that they will frown upon the camouflaged, false economy with which you gentlemen now seem to be obsessed. I appeal to you to adopt this amendment in the name of "those taxpayers" who are looking to this Government for the development of the rivers and harbors, who have paid their taxes into the Treasury, who have a right to demand of you that their money be expended in developing a better and more useful transportation system on our rivers and harbors throughout the land. The only change, practically, made by this amendment is an increase in the amount to be appropriated from twelve to twenty-five million, not such an exorbitant amount for all the river and harbor improvements of the United States. Let the Republican Party answer for this ill-conceived idea of economy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KELLER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for one minute.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, no one, of course, can say very much in one minute. Still I desire to express the feeling of the people of St. Paul on river navigation.

We were told several years ago that we had a 6-foot channel from St. Louis to St. Paul and that it was up to us to provide terminals for traffic. The people furnished about $200,000, which was expended for the improvement of the river. We have fairly good connection with the railroads and the barges and have handled some coal and iron ore over the docks. But after about a year we discovered that we did not have a 6-foot channel to St. Louis. The city of St. Paul has gone to great expense in preparing for river navigation. Docks have been built, cranes have been installed, and plans have been completed for the extension of harbor and dock facilities. During approximately two months of the year, generally in the middle of the summer, the river becomes so low that with the present channel it is impossible for boats to ply up and down with cargoes. With the proper improvement of the river this difficulty would be eliminated and this great natural waterway would become the active and bristling lane of traffic that Divine Providence intended it to be.

Complaint has been expressed from time to time, especially during the last two years, by the railroads of the country that it is practically impossible to transport the freight of the country on the existing lines; also that some of the bulkier commodities are handled at a loss, especially in the Mississippi Valley region. With proper improvement of the river a great amount of this business could be handled by boats at a saving in rates, while also relieving our transportation system and increasing its efficiency in the handling of other commodities. A vast amount of the agricultural products of the upper Mississippi Valley States could be sent down the river to the great distribution points along its course or to New Orleans, and thence to the eastern or western seaboard. It would mean a connecting link in our future economic and commercial development; and if the eyes of this Congress have been focused on the future at all, they certainly must appreciate the absolute necessity of proper development and maintenance of a channel in the Mississippi River sufficient to permit of its use throughout the entire year. I have always been a strong advocate of economy in the expenditure of public funds, but have never advocated an economy which threatens to interfere with the future development of our country or its activities. We have become accustomed to doing great things in the past two years, and the reconstruction period before us calls for greater accomplishments and greater activities, but within our own borders—progressive, constructive accomplishments—for the future well-being of our citizens and of our country. Let us not by any means adopt a policy of economy which will threaten our future as the leading nation of the world.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BRIGGS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have this amendment read for information.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas submits an amendment, which the Clerk will read for information.

Mr. BRIGGS. I also ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman also asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the gentleman's amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BRIGGS: Insert a new paragraph after the Denison amendment to read as follows:

"There is hereby appropriated the sum of $1,131,000 for improvement of Galveston channel."

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, this provision for $1,131,000 embraced in the proposed amendment is contained in the estimates of the Chief of Engineers, and is one that is particularly vital to the harbor at Galveston and to the people of the Middle States and Southwest.

At that point there is being constructed now by the Government a huge sea wall to protect the harbor and Government works against the attacks of the sea. The sea wall provided for will be completed under the estimates of the engineers some time probably early this fall. The 1919 report of the Chief of Engineers at the time it was given out, showed that the wall would probably be completed about the end of May. The estimate now, I undersand, is that it will be somewhere nearer the 1st of October.

That wall has yet no filling behind it. It will have to bear the brunt of storms hurled against it. The appropriation is regarded by the engineers as an urgent one.

A board of Army engineers especially appointed under authorization of Congress has only recently filed a rather exhaustive report, setting forth the reasons why Congress ought to immediately provide for filling behind the Government extension of the sea wall at Galveston, as contemplated and provided for under the plan adopted by the United States when it undertook the work of construction. The extent of the pressure and strain to which the wall would be subjected in storms of great intensity has been calculated and outlined in that report—now in the hands of the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors before transmission to Congress—clearly indicating that as against attacks of the sea in ordinary storms the wall alone, unsupported by filling, would probably prove sufficient; but to protect against extraordinary or more violent storms, such as have visited Galveston on two occasions since the beginning of the year 1900, the filling and other protective works behind the wall are an absolute necessity.

Of course no one can tell when such severe storms are likely to occur, and it is not the course of wisdom to speculate against their recurrence but to provide at once against it.

The present great reinforced granite concrete sea wall, which was constructed by the county of Galveston and completed in July, 1904, is reinforced and strengthened by filling behind such wall, which not only starts at the level of the top of the wall but rises on a constantly increasing elevation for a width of 200 feet from the edge of the wall to the rear crest of the fill; there an additional retaining wall is built and sheet piling sunk to protect such filling against the action of the spray, which in storms may fall upon the cement and brick pavement crowning the fill.

The plan of the original sea wall, which was ably devised by a board of engineers composed of Brig. Gen. Henry H. Robert, United States Army, retired; Mr. Alfred Noble; and Mr. H. C. Ripley, was accepted and followed by the United States engineers in the construtions of the Government extension westward of such wall for the protection of Fort Crockett.

The wonderful stability of this construction and its demonstrated ability to resist the action of the severest storm, persuaded Army engineers to recommend substantially the same plan of construction for the present Government extension eastward of such wall to Fort San Jacinto, at the island end of the entrance of the harbor into the Gulf of Mexico. It will be remembered that Congress provided for this extension of the sea wall in the river and harbor act approved July 27, 1916, stipulating for certain cooperation on the part of the county of Galveston in the construction of part of the sea wall and for the conveyance to the Government without charge of about 600 acres of land on the east end of Galveston Island adjoining the military reservation of Fort San Jacinto, adding thereby to such reservation additional land, which gives the Government at Galveston one of the finest military posts in the United States. And when all of said area has been filled will furnish an unrivaled site for the construction of permanent barracks and establishment of a large station for both permanent troops to man the fortifications and for the concentration, as a base for military operations, of other large bodies of troops designed to be used elsewhere.

The value of such property protected by the work already undertaken and yet to be completed will alone equal, if not exceed, the expenditure made and to be made by the Government in carrying out such protective measures, irrespective of the inestimable value of such protection to the harbor and commerce drawn from not only the State of Texas but from the States of the Middle West, and even farther to the Pacific coast.

It should be remembered that the Government in building, as it has done, this great harbor at Galveston, has given a port to the United States greater than most and as great as any in the Nation.

The saving in freight rates alone to the people of the South, Southwest, and West by reason of the existence of this port—closer to them than any other for European and Latin-American trade—has been conservatively estimated as at least $10,000,000 a year, thereby nearly paying back in one year to the Government, through return in cheaper rates and greater facilities to the people, the total cost of developing the great harbor and port of Galveston.

It is to preserve these splendid facilities and insure them against irreparable damage and injury that the Government is more than justified in not only carrying out promptly the present project of protective works but of adding to the same such additional ones as will forever assure to the commerce and people of this country the permanence of this wonderful outlet to the sea. Not only is the harbor and port of Galveston of transcendent importance to the commerce of the country, but its presence right upon the ocean—instead of, as with so many harbors, many miles up a river from the entrance to the sea—causes vessels the least difficulty and loss of time in entering and leaving such port.

A Government engineer has also stated that what gives this port so much of an advantage over others is that when the desired depths of channel are obtained they can be so easily maintained at a low cost.

In the report for the fiscal year 1919 of the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, the statement is made that the effect of the improvements of the Government at Galveston has been to make that port in normal times, just previous to the present war, the second port of the United States in value of exports; such report further showing that for the year 1918, when Galveston was still suffering from the effects of the diversion of commerce by the Government during the war, the value of the commerce passing through the port was only a little less than $500,000,000.

Since the signing of the armistice commerce has again begun to flow in increasing volume through Galveston, until now it has almost reached the normal prewar stage, and it will not be long before she will again occupy the position of being the second greatest export port in the United States. Already the shipments in 1919 of cotton through Galveston have been greater than those through either Savannah or New Orleans. In fact, Galveston has again become the greatest cotton-export port in the world.

During the year 1919, 678 vessels in the foreign trade passed through the harbor of Galveston. In the month of November alone 68 vessels, with an aggregate tonnage of 170,103 tons, cleared from Galveston in the foreign trade, carrying domestic exports valued approximately at $85,000,000, while for the month of December 82 ships of an aggregate tonnage of 199,240 cleared in the foreign trade. To illustrate how rapidly Galveston is regaining her former prestige and commercial importance, it need only be mentioned that her cotton exports this past year have been two and a half times as great as they were the year previous, and that her wheat exports, amounting this year to over 17,000,000 bushels, have been nearly four times as great as in 1918, thereby raising the value of the foreign export figures alone to almost twice the value of such commerce for the year 1918, for in the Chief of Engineer's report the coastwise as well as foreign export commerce is included, and the value of such coastwise trade alone for 1918 amounted to over $175,000,000. The estimated value of the export foreign trade for the year 1919, given at $445,000,000, is above and entirely independent of the value of the coastwise trade during such period.

In addition to the many foreign steamship lines which have regular service from this great port, the United States Shipping Board has also established there 12 regular lines of steamships between Europe and Latin-American ports, and has in contemplation the establishment of additional lines.

But it is not alone the great port of Galveston, which has no rival on the Gulf coast except New Orleans, that is dependent upon the preservation of the great harbor improvements there, for it is also through this same harbor that all vessels must pass which enter and depart from the ports of Texas City, Houston, and Port Bolivar. It is true these other ports have separate channels, but all such channels are only reached through the harbor of Galveston.

As reported by the Chief of Engineers in his report for the fiscal year 1919, the commerce of Texas City for the year 1918 was valued at over $20,000,000, while for the year 1919, with its many new steamship lines and increased trade, it would be safe to estimate such commerce at a value not less than $50,000,000. The value of commerce of Port Bolivar, according to the same engineer's report for 1918, is given at $8,426,919, while the port of Houston is given at $116,332,138.

I appreciate and favor the practice of the most rigid economy in appropriations at this time, and it is for that reason that I have not been heard to complain of the cutting of the $9,000,000 estimate, made by the Chief of Engineers for maintenance and preservation of river and harbor projects, down to $5,000,000, being made available in a lump sum and to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers. From the assurances of the committee and expressions of the Chief of Engineers, I am inclined to think that with the remainder of the funds on hand for purpose of maintenance and with the $5,000,000 appropriation for such purpose that all the present river and harbor projects which the Government is endeavoring to maintain can be tided over until the next rivers and harbors appropriation in March, 1921; that is, that enough funds will be available, if conservatively expended, to bridge over the period between the end of the present fiscal year in June, 1920, until March, 1921.

But the fill behind the Government extension of the sea wall is not classified as a maintenance project; it is regarded as belonging to the class designated as "prosecution of works of improvement heretofore authorized by Congress," for which only $7,000,000 is carried in this bill to meet the demands of all river and harbor projects in the United States.

As the Chief of Engineers in his estimates recommended the necessity of $33,000,000 for such projects, and as it has been stated that his revised and final estimates, after cutting out what he felt could be eliminated, still made necessary an appropriation of approximately $19,500,000, it is apparent that the prosecution of much work on pending river and harbor approved projects must be seriously retarded and delayed if only the $7,000,000 carried by this bill is finally provided.

To relieve, therefore, the emergency which exists for this $1,131,000 requested by the Chief of Engineers for filling behind the Government extension of the sea wall at Galveston, the necessity for which should be evident to all, I have offered this amendment to the pending bill and earnestly urge its adoption.

I may add that after the provision for the extension of this wall, when the river and harbor act of 1916 was adopted, the conveyance of 600 acres of land to the Government, as provided for in the said act, was duly made, and that the county, by a resolution of its commissioners' court on August 13, 1917, made provision for raising the sum of $560,000 as the portion of said sea wall extension which the county of Galveston was required to provide for the construction. A certified copy of both this order of the court and the previous order, dated July 9, 1917, I include as a part of my remarks.

On the 9th day of July, 1917, the county commissioners' court of Galveston County, Tex., convened in regular session at a regular term of said court, all the members thereof being present, to wit, G. E. Mann, county judge; James A. Boddeker, commissioner precinct No. 1; Fred Hartel, commissioner precinct No. 2; John Egert, commissioner precinct No. 3; H. A. Deats, commissioner precinct No. 4; and on motion of Commissioner Fred Hartel, seconded by Commissioner J. A. Boddeker, passed the following order:

"Whereas the county of Galveston is a county of the State of Texas bordering on the coast of the Gulf of Mexico, and said county and the United States Government have each acquired a right of way for the construction of a sea wall on Galveston Island, in said county, said wall to be an extension of the present sea wall now owned by the county and situated on Galveston Island; and the county's proportion of said wall is 3,300 feet, which construction is to be paid for on a proportionate estimate from the United States Engineer Department as the work progresses, the United States Government having offered to build said sea wall for the county at the same time the United States Government sea wall is constructed, and it is necessary to provide funds for the county to establish, locate, erect, construct, extend, protect, strengthen, maintain, and keep in repair and otherwise improve any sea wall or breakwater, and to improve, maintain, and beautify any boulevard erected in connection with such sea wall or breakwater: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the commissioners' court of Galveston County, Tex., and it is hereby ordered, That for the purposes named herein a tax of and at the rate of 25 cents on each $100 valuation of the taxable property in Galveston County, Tex., is and shall be annually assessed and collected; and said tax is now levied for the current year and the same shall be collected for the current year and annually assessed and collected thereafter, as may be required, within the limits required by law, and applied to the purposes named.

"It is further ordered by the court that all moneys collected under this levy shall be deposited to the credit of the sea-wall improvement and maintenance fund of Galveston County."

GALVESTON, TEX., August 13, 1917.

Maj. E. N. JOHNSTON,
Corps United States Engineers, Galveston, Tex.

DEAR SIR: With reference to the proposed extension of the sea wall on the east end of Galveston Island, Galveston County, Tex., project referred to in the document known as 'Public, No. 168, Sixty-fourth Congress, H. R. 12193,' the same being an act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

This is to advise you that Galveston County, Tex., has secured the right of way and is now ready to proceed with and meet all of the requirements of the portion of the act above cited, and contained in pages 8 and 9 of said act, affecting harbor at Galveston so far as follows:

"Galveston Channel, Tex.: Continuing improvement by construction of sea-wall extension in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 1390, Sixty-second Congress, third session, subject to the conditions therein named, $200,000: Provided, That no part of the amount herein appropriated shall be expended and no contract shall be entered into under this appropriation until the county or city of Galveston and other local interests have donated the lands to the United States, as set forth in said Document No. 1390, and shall have quieted all claims to the present San Jacinto Reservation, nor until the said city or county of Galveston shall have obtained a right of way and made provision in a manner satisfactory to the Secretary of War for paying the cost of construction of at least 3,300 feet of similar sea-wall extension in addition to that herein appropriated for: Provided further, That the entire work of construction shall be done under the direction of the Secretary of War, and the funds appropriated by Congress and those furnished by the county or city of Galveston shall be expended by him."

We herewith formally request the United States Government, through proper department thereof, to proceed with the project, and the county of Galveston stands prepared to meet each requirement of the United States Government in connection therewith on demand or other direction.

The county of Galveston, by proper order of the commissioner court, has levied a tax of 25 cents on the $100 of taxable values of Galveston County, and made arrangements to obtain the funds necessary for the aforesaid premises, and is ready to pay, will pay, and promises to pay over to the Secretary of War, or according to his direction from time to time, on demand such sums of money as may be required to pay the monthly estimated cost of construction of said sea-wall extension as provided in said act up to the amount of $560,000, or so much thereof as may be required to carry out and complete said work as contemplated by said law, the same being the portion of the said sea-wall extension which the county of Galveston is required to provide for the cost of constructing.

Witness our hands as county commissioners of Galveston County, Tex., sitting as the county commissioners court, under the seal of said court.

JAS. A. BODDEKER.
FRED HARTEL.
JOHN EGERT.
H. A. DEATS.

THE STATE OF TEXAS,
County of Galveston.

I, George F. Burgess, clerk of the county court in and for Galveston County, State of Texas, do hereby certify that the above and foregoing is a true and correct copy of an order of the county commissioners court in and for Galveston County, State of Texas, made and entered August 13, 1917, as the same appears of record in my office in commissioners court record book No. 9, on pages Nos. 615 and 616.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the impress of my official seal at my office in the city and county of Galveston, State of Texas, on this the 26th day of December, A. D. 1919.

GEO. F. BURGESS,
Clerk of the County Court in and for Galveston County, State of Texas.
[SEAL.] By J. F. JOHNSTON,
Deputy Clerk.

It may also be stated that the county of Galveston, outside of its contribution to the expense of the Government extension of the sea wall, has had to previously bear such a tremendous tax burden in constructing the present sea wall now in use and improvements in connection therewith, as well as in the erecting of other protective measures to safeguard the county seat, that the limit of taxation under the State constitution has, for such purposes, it is alleged, been nearly, if not completely, reached.

Although an effort was recently made to get the people of Texas to adopt an amendment to the State constitution enabling the city and county of Galveston to exceed the present constitutional limit and issue additional bonds for further protective works, such effort resulted in failure, the proposed amendment being defeated by a remarkably close vote, but still it was defeated. This situation presents a most serious aspect with respect to any suggestions for further county cooperation, and is one which deserves generous consideration at the hands of the Federal Government in the carrying on of these great protective works of such tremendous value to not only the people of the locality but to all of that vast population and industrial, agricultural, and mining interests of the whole Southwest that depend upon the security and preservation of the port of Galveston as an outlet for their commerce in their great coastwise and foreign trade relations with other parts of the United States and foreign lands.

In concluding I desire to say that it seems to me the value of the great river and harbor projects of this county to the people and commerce of this Nation can not be overestimated. I grant you that in the past much money has been wasted by the Government in the development of unimportant streams and insignificant so-called ports or harbors; but while such expenditure ought to emphasize the importance of refusing to make appropriations for projects that are without merit, yet it also emphasizes the enormous value and great benefit to the Nation of the further development of great waterways and harbor projects that are a part of the commercial life of the people in their trade relations among themselves and with foreign nations, without which this wonderful country can not hope to maintain or further develop its tremendous wealth and power among the nations of the world.

Representing, as I do, one of the great arteries in that commercial life, the port and harbor of Galveston, I ask that you support and adopt the amendment for the emergency appropriation which I have offered.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HOWARD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I shall not undertake to discuss this matter, with the exception of asking this Congress, before passing this bill in a lump sum and giving opportunity to some engineers to cut out in the great Southwest one of our great benefits, that you give due consideration to it.

I want to call attention to the history of navigation on the Missouri River. It may be true that great, gilded boats do not run on that river and afford the kind of transportation that you have in some of your communities, but listen, gentlemen: The mere fact that the Missouri River has been treated by the United States as navigable has resulted in a lowering of the freight rate on every bushel of wheat, every bushel of corn, every barrel of oil, and every piece of live-stock products that we produce in the great Southwest and send into your markets. It has also resulted in a better condition for your factories that ship their products into our markets; and while a few hundred thousand dollars may have been spent on the Missouri River, which looks as though it was wasted money, it has, as a matter of fact, my friends, resulted in economy in the matter of freight rates to every citizen in the Southwest, and has been beneficial to you people who consume our products. And I say to you that I believe there is more economy in the adoption of either the Small amendment or the Denison amendment than there is in the proposition to make a lump-sum appropriation as you are doing in this bill, leaving it to some engineer here in Washington not fully acquainted with all the conditions to cut out our right, out in that country, to base our freight rates upon our products and upon your products on the Missouri River basis, as it is done to-day and has been done since the Government of the United States has recognized the Missouri River as navigable.

The CHAIRMAN. All the time controlled by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] has expired. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENNEDY] has 20 minutes remaining.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY], a member of the committee. [Applause.]

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the House has before it now for its consideration three propositions. The first, and the one which has been debated at length here, the one which the House has in mind and the one upon which it will really vote, and the only one which I think it will really consider, is the Denison proposition. What is that? It is that we expend $11,000,000 upon four waterways, two stretches of the Mississippi River, the Missouri, and the Ohio.

If you wanted to center opposition to rivers and harbors, if you wanted to crystallize that opposition, if you wanted to give to those who say we should not improve them at all a justification for so saying, you could not do it better than by this proposed amendment. Why do I say that? Let us take the Missouri River first. The gentleman who has had the disposal of the time [Mr. SMALL], the gentleman who was formerly chairman of this committee, the gentleman who leads this fight, wrote a letter recently questioning the wisdom, and wanting to be advised as to whether or not any future appropriation should be made for the Missouri River. The Chief of Engineers, only as late as 1918, wrote a letter to the local engineer advising him to inform the communities which he served that it was doubtful whether Congress would make any future appropriation for the Missouri River, anything more than simply to preserve from destruction what had been done there.

So we have here as one of the proposals a proposition to expend upon the Missouri River the sum of $3,000,000; and I ask the House, in view of the letter from the gentleman from North Carolina, in view of the letter from the Chief of Engineers—they two agreeing upon this subject—in view of the fact that there is no commerce at all upon that river, whether they want to add $3,000,000 to this appropriation for that purpose?

Now, let us come to the next proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON]. It is for the Mississippi River between the Ohio and the Missouri Rivers. The original estimate in the bill was for $750,000. The engineer himself considered that that should be cut to $500,000. And what is the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois? What is his proposition in view of the fact that the estimate of the engineer is $500,000? The gentleman from Illinois proposes to add to this bill in these days when we must practice economy the trifling sum of $4,000,000.

Mr. DENISON. No; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I have taken the figures from the gentleman's amendment. I am not at all astonished that the gentleman may have not studied his own proposition enough to remember whether it was $2,000,000 or $4,000,000.

Mr. DENISON. I thought the gentleman was speaking of the Ohio. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. DEMPSEY. No; I am speaking of this part of the Mississippi River.

Mr. DENISON. I misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. DEMPSEY. The amount suggested is just what I state. Now, if the gentleman will turn to the report of the engineers, he will see that to-day, and for 10 years past, they have had a navigable depth at low water of 8 feet. But what more does he want, or what more does he propose to get?

Let us take the gentleman's next suggestion, as to the Mississippi River between the Missouri River and St. Paul. The original estimate of the engineers was $2,000,000. Upon questioning and developing the real facts that was cut by the engineers to $1,200,000. And what does the gentleman propose? Why, these are days when we should not be concerned about a little money. All you have to do is to raise taxes. It is difficult to find where you will impose the additional tax. It is difficult to imagine how a community can stand it, but the gentleman, with the same lightness of touch, with the same disregard of the state of the Treasury, proposes, in face of the estimates of the engineers, that we shall expend $2,000,000.

Now, let us come to the gentleman's last proposal, that as to the Ohio River. The revised estimate of the Engineers was $1,000,000. Again, the gentleman says let us not take into consideration at all present conditions. What is the trouble, on paper, in doubling that amount and calling that $2,000,000?

Two million dollars in the face of what? Two million dollars in the face of the fact that on the 1st day of July there was in the Treasury unexpended to the credit of this river $12,700,000. And what was the condition on the 1st day of January? I have that in a statement from the engineer, furnished this afternoon. The engineer says that there was on hand an unexpended balance on the 1st day of January of $9,558,815.02. Nine million and a half dollars on hand to the credit of this fund on the 1st day of January. Yet they want to add $2,000,000 more to that sum. Why, they can not possibly spend anything like the $9,000,000 before we will pass a new river and harbor bill. Why can they not? The engineer testified before our committee to this state of things: That on the Ohio River they have a limited number of plants which do this work, that it is impossible to get additional plants there on account of the enormous expense of transporting and installing them, that competition in work on the Ohio River is restricted to those who are at present doing the work there, and so it is impossible to do any large amount of work in any one year.

In addition to that, owing to rains, owing to the difficulties in the winter season, the work can be prosecuted only during a limited part of the year, and so there is not the slightest possibility, there is not even a chance that you can expend any considerable part of this enormous sum that is on hand. Yet the gentleman proposes that we shall impose additional taxes and continue keeping these sums in the Treasury to the credit of these projects, unexpended in this time when we have taxed to the limit and can not find an additional way to impose taxation. That is a fair review of the gentleman's proposals in detail.

Now, let us take the gentleman's proposition in a broader way. Let us take it on general considerations, and what do we find? Why, we find that the gentleman's proposal is confined to the poorest waterway projects in the United States, to the projects which least merit the attention of this Congress; and, on the other hand, he excludes all the great harbors and all the great waterways of the United States. Not a cent does he propose to expend on the Atlantic, not a cent on the Pacific, not a penny on the Great Lakes. All these are excluded from the gentleman's consideration, and he limits his attention to practically the little bit of country which he can look at from his back porch, from day to day, when he visits his home. He can not see the great, turbulent Atlantic. He can not see those wonderous inland lakes, the greatest anywhere on the face of the earth. He can not see the beautiful and placid waters of the Pacific. His vision does not reach down to the blue waters of the Gulf. All he can see is the Ohio and the Mississippi Rivers, and last and most astounding of all, that great inland waterway—the Missouri.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DEMPSEY. So I say that the gentleman's vision, aside from detailed consideration, aside from its illustration of a want of vision, the gentleman's proposal illustrates the trouble that we always meet with in the consideration of river and harbor bills when the committee comes in here, having prepared and being ready to present a bill which takes in the whole continent, having tried to be fair and just toward everyone in the preparation of the bill. When we have done that, the gentleman from Squedunk Creek comes to the forefront and insists on occupying the stage, and he says that creek must be improved, although it is only 6 inches deep, and it must have an enormous appropriation of money or he will balk and refuse to see things in a national way and refuse to join in great and necessary improvements.

Let us take the proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] and see how that stands before this House. This committee, it is true, considered these items one by one, and the committee, with care and diligence and thought, examined the engineer and concluded, 16 to 1—those old, familiar figures—to adopt this lump sum and not to appropriate by items. All I have to say as to the gentleman's proposal is that, instead of it having the sanction of the engineers, for which he claims so much, it should have the sanction of this committee. This committee never considered the appropriating of these sums item by item and never agreed with the engineer that these amounts were the right and proper figures as to future improvements. On the contrary, this committee, as a result of an examination lasting only a few days, reached the conclusion that the amount of $42,000,000, instead of being reduced to $19,000,000, as the engineers suggested, should be reduced to $7,000,000, and that that would be ample and would satisfy every improvement that should be made in this time of stress and financial difficulty.

My time is nearly ended, and I want to say just a word as to the effect of this bill. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] says that he takes a just pride in the committee; that he wants it to retain the great and good name which it has enjoyed in the past. Let me say to the gentleman from North Carolina that I share his hopes, but I believe that if the committee is to gain that good name, if it is to have influence in the country in the future, it can not hope to do anything better here than in days like this to cut appropriations to the last point which will insure the requisite degree of care of all waterway improvements, and that is done in this bill. Let me say further to the gentleman that we do need to convert the public from an adverse attitude toward this committee, we do need to have the public believe in this committee, we do need to have a good name in the community and in the country at large, because the country needs transportation by water, the country needs to have the railroads relieved, and the only way it can have that done is through this committee. If we pursue, as we are seeking to pursue now, a method which will induce the country to believe that we are, in a businesslike and economical method, doing that which is necessary and not doing anything more, that we are appropriating every sum that is necessary for commerce, but are not appropriating money to tie it up in the Treasury, then we will deserve and will gain the confidence of the country, but if we fail to do it we will forfeit and justly forfeit it. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CURRY of California: Page 8, line 3, after the word "Oakland," strike out "and" and insert a comma, and after the word "Berkeley" insert "and Albany."

Mr. CURRY of California. Mr. Chairman, this is to correct a clerical mistake that was made in the committee, and is acceptable, I understand, to the chairman.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the committee has no objection to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. CURRY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers a third amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

"The coast of Texas in the vicinity of Aransas Pass, Port Aransas, Corpus Christi, and Rockport, with a view to the establishment of a safe and adequate harbor."

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, the amendment is acceptable to the committee.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that the chairman of the committee informed me that there was no objection to that on his part.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL of California. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RANDALL of California: Page 7, line 15, after the word "breakwater," insert "to a point between the Long Beach Harbor entrance and the sea outlet of the flood diversion channel."

Mr. RANDALL of California. Mr. Chairman, this amendment makes no change in the bill except to state definitely that the full proposed extension of the breakwater shall be surveyed, and I understand it is satisfactory to the committee.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. It has been passed upon favorably by the subcommittee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from California.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state that this has the approval of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GRIFFIN: Page 2, lines 17, 18, and 19, after the word "surveys," strike out the words "and contingencies for rivers and harbors for which there may be no special appropriation."

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the sponsors for this bill profess to have great faith in the discretion of the Secretary of War and the Board of Engineers—that is, so far as the allocation of the $7,000,000 appropriation is concerned, in the first section of the bill. But when we come down to the second section of the bill which is now before us we find that they are painfully specific and particular in indicating the various appropriations that are to be made for surveys, and I regret to say—or perhaps I had better put it this way and say I hope that none of the gentlemen on this side of the aisle have been seduced by the dangling of these little promises—glittering bait held up for their temptation—surveys in their pet localities. For what does it all amount to? Four hundred thousand dollars is appropriated, and the committee gives you a list of 64 separate and distinct projects; in other words, $6,250 for each survey, and this is the little bait that we are asked to nibble at and swallow.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Pardon me. I have not the time.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. The gentleman does not want to make an incorrect statement?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I can not yield unless I get additional time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Now, my amendment is directed at a little joker in this section, and I call the attention of our friends here, who are perhaps influenced by this little bait, to the language on lines 17, 18, and 19, which I ask to be stricken out. Are they going to get this appropriation? Is a survey going to be made? Is it directed to be made? No. The $400,000 may be used in the discretion of this all-powerful Board of Engineers, because the language reads, "for examination, survey, and"—what?—"contingencies for rivers and harbors for which there may be no special appropriation," so that if the Board of Engineers decides that there is some other project for which there may be no special appropriation, they can divert this $400,000 to that purpose, and you gentlemen who believe that you have the promise of something in your pet locality will be left out in the cold.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I send an amendment to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. There is already an amendment pending. The gentleman from Washington will please defer until this pending amendment is disposed of. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HICKS: Page 7, after the item in line 4, insert "12-foot channel from Peconic Bay to Jamaica Bay, N. Y."

Mr. HICKS. I will say to the gentlemen of the committee that that is acceptable to the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. CALDWELL. I understood the gentleman was going to make his amendment read "15 feet" instead of "12 feet."

Mr. HICKS. I think 12 feet will be sufficient.

Mr. CALDWELL. You had better make it 15 now, and not take another bite at it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas demand a division?

Mr. BLANTON. I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas demands a division. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 137, noes 0.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. MILLER] claims recognition. The Chair will first recognize the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I send an amendment to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MILLER: On page 8, after the seventh line, insert the following:

"Duwamish Waterway, Seattle Harbor, Wash.: Survey of Duwamish Waterway, Seattle Harbor, with report on the practicability of widening or deepening, or both widening and deepening, the channel to accommodate present and future commerce."

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say for the information of the committee that included as a part of our harbor improvements is the construction of three waterways, which have been constructed entirely at local expense. No Government money has been appropriated for it. It has been done under the direction of the Board of Engineers of the Army. There is a right of way 400 feet wide. One hundred and fifty feet now is excavated to a depth of 20 feet. We simply want a survey as to the practicability of increasing it to its full width of 400 feet and at a greater depth, if necessary; all to be done at private expense, the Government simply making the survey. The committee is favorable to it.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have the amendment read again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I think the words "survey of" should be stricken out, so as to authorize only a preliminary examination. That is the case with all orders for surveys. I suggest to the gentleman that he leave out the words "survey of."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Washington desire to modify his amendment?

Mr. MILLER. I will modify it in accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment by striking out the words "survey of." Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the second amendment of the gentleman from Washington.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MILLER: Page 8, following the previous amendment in line 7, insert the following:

"Wrangell Narrows, Alaska: Survey of Wrangell Narrows with a view of determining the channel to accommodate present and future commerce, and the determination of the relative advantages and practicability of the above improvement of Wrangell Narrows, as compared with the improvement of Dry Straits, recommended in House Document 68, Sixty-fifth Congress, first session."

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I make the same suggestion as to that as I made to the first amendment—that the words "survey of" be stricken out.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment in accordance with the gentleman's suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WINGO: Page 5, between lines 22 and 23, insert "Red River, Ark., Okla., and Tex., from Fulton, Ark., to Denison, Tex."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I offer that amendment with the approval of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 142, noes 2.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMALL. I ask the Clerk to report the amendment sent to the desk by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SMITHWICK].

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SMITHWICK: Page 5, after line 15, insert a new paragraph as follows:
"Appalachicola Bay."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANSFIELD: Page 5, between lines 16 and 17, insert the following:
"Pass Palacios on Matagorda Peninsula, Tex., with a view to securing a channel 18 feet deep."

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I have not had an opportunity of taking up this matter with the committee, but I am reliably informed that the recent hurricane in Texas has cut a new channel across Matagorda Peninsula, about 18 miles east of Pass Cavallo. Some of the best citizens of that place inform me that they believe they now have a channel 18 feet deep. I simply ask that an investigation be made, and I hope the committee will vote for it.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, a number of surveys have been passed on by the subcommittee, and they have all been favorably recommended. The committee knows nothing about the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MANSFIELD], and they would not like to accept it as long as they have not given it any consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MANSFIELD].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. MANSFIELD) there were—ayes 96, noes 95.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the last paragraph of section 1 of the river and harbor act approved March 2, 1919, which reads: "No work shall be undertaken upon any new project herein adopted unless the Secretary of War shall be of the opinion that, based upon the cost at the time of entering upon the work, the project can be completed at a cost not greater than 40 per cent in excess of the estimate of cost in the report upon such project," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section. This section strikes out a provision that has been placed in the law, which limits the Army engineers to a 40 per cent expenditure in excess of estimates on all projects. It protects the Public Treasury. By referring to the committee report it will be seen that a number of projects are mentioned, including Scuppernong Creek, Raccoon Creek, Newark Bay, and others that will be without limit to expenditure under the bill. For instance, there is the inland waterway from the Delaware River to Chesapeake Bay. The estimates for a 35-foot channel for large ships run up to $20,000,000 or over for a 13-mile canal. If you wipe out this provision, which puts a limitation of 40 per cent in excess of the estimates, it will give the engineers an opportunity to expend any amount upon that project that they choose, or $40,000,000, if need be, on a 13-mile canal. The same thing is true of a number of other projects which are mentioned in the report. I call attention to one known as Newark Bay, because a newspaper clipping was placed on my table a day or two ago with which I think the House ought to be acquainted. This is a proposed project for the reclamation of meadowland, according to the headlines of the Newark papers. This article is a column in length; and they have had a large meeting in Newark to urge the proposition on Congress. The purpose, briefly, is for the reclamation of public land and also for digging a deeper channel. I call attention to extracts which read:

Concerted action * * * was decided upon at a meeting in the Down Town Club last night.

* * * * * * *

The program * * * comprehends the reclamation of the meadowland adjacent to the waterways with an adequate highways system affording easy access and communication, and the coordination of the railroad facilities, the establishment of terminals for these and for steamship lines, and the construction of a belt-line railroad.

* * * * * * *

Later it says:

That the development of the port facilities is dependent upon an appropriation for a deeper channel in the bay and tributary rivers was declared by J. Spencer Smith, of the State Board of Commerce and Navigation. He urged that an assessment be levied and a representative, preferably Brig. Gen. Black, recently retired as Chief of Engineers, be engaged to promote the project in Congress.

This suggestion was strongly approved by Dr. Charles F. Kraemer, of the Newark Real Estate Board, who related an experience of a few years ago, when local representatives secured the inclusion of an appropriation in the rivers and harbors bill only to have it defeated by Congressman FREAR. "What is needed now is action," he said. "We must get the votes in Congress, and to do this should be ably represented at Washington."

I am not concerned with the reference to myself, but here is a proposition to have the retired Chief of Engineers urge upon Congress the necessity for this land reclamation and waterway improvement. His influence could be exerted upon the Board of Engineers to choose whatever project or expend whatever amount he wants on a number of pending projects. I do not believe he would accept that job, but it is the proposal of Newark citizens, according to this article of a few days ago.

Section 3 will remove all restrictions in expenditures, and you gentlemen who have been so anxious to hold the reins over the Army Engineers will find that will be the effect.

I move an amendment to strike out the section.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, 40 per cent does not represent the increase in the cost of work such as has to be done upon rivers and harbors, and we knew that if we left that provision in the bill we could not have any work done, no matter how important it might be. In order to avoid that, and to get work done where it had to be done, we found that it would be absolutely necessary to repeal this provision. The committee are unanimous on this point. There was no division of opinion upon the subject. We all believed that this should be repealed. We found upon investigation that it was necessary, and we ask that the provision stand.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] to strike out the section.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. Delaware River, between Philadelphia, Pa., and Trenton, N. J.: The two projects heretofore authorized for Delaware River from Allegheny Avenue, Philadelphia, Pa., to Lalor Street, Trenton, N. J., and above Lalor Street to the upper railroad bridge at Trenton, are hereby consolidated to form a single project between Philadelphia and Trenton.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to proceed out of order for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CALDWELL. Reserving the right to object, on what subject?

Mr. REAVIS. I am not inclined to submit to the censorship of the gentleman from New York. If he is not willing to take a chance, he has his remedy.

Mr. CALDWELL. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York objects.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It was my purpose to introduce an amendment for an appropriation to continue the work already begun upon the Delaware River, but I find that the spirit of the committee is against increased appropriations; therefore I will not present the amendment.

The Sixty-fourth Congress appropriated $40,000 to construct a basin at Trenton, and $25,000 to improve the channel in the Delaware River between Philadelphia and Trenton. As a result, Trenton expended many thousands of dollars in order to construct water terminals. Within two years $25,000,000 have been expended upon the upper Delaware to develop the industries of our country. It seems to me we are exercising a very niggardly economy when we do not appropriate money to improve our natural resources. [Applause.] Within the memory of many gentlemen here the pony express was the only means of carrying letters from the Mississippi River to the Pacific coast. Congress appropriated millions of acres to the railway companies in order that they might develop the great West. Was that economy? No one doubts it. Now our friends from the mountain tops and the prairies of the West are transported in easy velvet chairs to the seas. Yet when we ask them to help us to develop the waterways they raise their hands and cry "economy." My friends, we must recognize that if the Esch bill or the Cummins bill becomes a law the development of railroads by private enterprise will be at an end. Now is the hour to develop our inland waterways. [Applause.] I hope the time is not far distant when all the main rivers of our country will be connected one with the other by great canals. Gentlemen cry "economy." Is it economy to tell England that she may pay the interest on the money we loaned her whenever she pleases? Is it economy to give her two or three billion dollars and permit her to build a navy costing $1,000,000,000 from the money we loaned her, in order that she may command the commerce of the seas? The Book of Estimates calls for a bill of $1,240,000,000 for the Army, when our friend who is sitting in the executive chair says, "Let us have a League of Nations in order that our country may never be at war." [Applause.] Is that economy? The Naval Committee, if guided by the Book of Estimates, will report a bill appropriating $584,000,000 for a Navy. Gentlemen, let us not confound inefficiency with economy. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WATSON] where he gets his figures of the amount to be carried in the coming Army and Navy appropriation bills.

Mr. WATSON. I received the figures from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MONDELL. What Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. WATSON. The one just across the aisle here.

Mr. MONDELL. And they told the gentleman that the Army bill was going to carry over a billion dollars?

Mr. WATSON. So I understand.

Mr. MONDELL. They do not make up the Army bill in that committee. The gentleman has not been talking with the right people. I suggest that he confer with the people who have charge of that bill. If he does, they will tell him that the bill will carry less than half the sum that he has stated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That the time within which applications for relief under the provisions of section 10 of the river and harbor act approved March 2, 1919, may be filed by contractors with the Secretary of War or with district engineers or other contracting officials of the Engineer Department is hereby limited to six months after the date of the approval of this act.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. Cumberland River above Nashville, Tenn.: The Secretary of War is hereby authorized to proceed with the prosecution of existing projects for lock and dam construction on that section of the river located in the State of Tennessee when the local interests in that State have complied with the conditions precedent imposed in the river and harbor act approved March 2, 1919.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I would state that this is recommended by the Engineer's office.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That section 10 of the act of March 2, 1919, making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on the rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 10. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to ascertain whether any of the contracts for work on river and harbor improvements entered into but not completed prior to April 6, 1917, the date of the entrance of the United States into war with Germany, have become inequitable and unjust on account of increased cost of materials, labor, and other unforeseen conditions arising out of the war; whether such contracts are still uncompleted or have been completed or were canceled; and to ascertain and report what amounts, if any, in addition to those fixed by the terms of said contract, should in justice and equity be paid to such contractors for work performed between April 6, 1917, and July 18, 1918, the date of the approval of an act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes,' on account of the increased cost of labor and materials and other unforeseen conditions arising out of the war during that period: Provided, That in every case the amount so ascertained shall not exceed the actual loss sustained by the contractor in performing the work between the said dates: Provided further, That when such amount shall have been ascertained the Secretary of War shall transmit to Congress for consideration a statement or statements of all findings or determinations rendered by authority of this section, the amounts thereof, the names of contractors, and dates of contracts: Provided further, That in any such case where a contract was canceled before its fulfillment on account of the increase in labor, materials, and other unforeseen conditions arising out of the war, the Secretary of War shall have authority to relieve any such contractor and his bondsmen from further liability or obligation on account of the nonperformance of such work or on account of the reletting of such contract by the Government.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the bill nor to the preceding section of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that the amendment is not germane, and the Chair will hear the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, section 8 of the bill now under consideration amends section 10 of the act of July 18, 1918. It amends that section by providing for a limitation of six months' time in which contractors, who are sought to be relieved under that section, may file claims with the Department of War. Therefore, it seems to me that any other amendment to that section affecting contractors or their rights with the War Department is germane, and therefore in order. I could not offer an amendment to any other section of the act of July 18, 1918, because section 10 of that act is the only one sought to be amended by the present bill, but the present bill offering in its last paragraph an amendment to section 10 of the act of July 18, 1918, certainly any other amendment touching the same subject is in order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, we have passed section 8 by adopting an amendment coming from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, which constitutes a new section to the bill, and would make the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky not an amendment to section 8 but to the new section adopted. Also the point of order should be sustained for the reason that the reference to a change of this law of March 2, 1919, was only in one particular, one specific item. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky has no reference to this particular matter in which section 8 amends the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] offers an amendment to add an additional section, and in this amendment he provides that certain contractors may under certain circumstances be excused from liability. It seems to the Chair that that is wholly unrelated to the subject of this bill or to the subject of any section of the bill, and as a portion of the amendment only, if not germane, is sufficient to make the whole amendment out of order. The Chair holds that the amendment is out of order and sustains the point of order.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to take up the time of the Chair if he has irrevocably made up his mind, but I would call his attention to this fact: This amendment sets out the original language in whole——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already ruled.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HUSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 11892, the river and harbor appropriation bill, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. SMALL. I am.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SMALL moves to recommit H. R. 11892 to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, with instructions to report back the same forthwith to the House with the following amendment, to wit: Strike out section 1 of said bill and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the sum of $5,000,000 be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available and to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers for the preservation and maintenance of existing river and harbor works: Provided further, That allotments from the amount hereby appropriated shall be made by the Secretary of War upon the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers: And provided further, That at the beginning of the third session of the Sixty-sixth Congress a special report shall be made to Congress by the Secretary of War, showing the amount allotted under this appropriation for each work for improvement or maintenance.

"That the following sums of money be, and are hereby, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available, and to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers for the construction, prosecution, and completion of works of improvement heretofore authorized by Congress and hereinafter named:

"Pollock Rip Channel, Mass.: Continuing improvement, $73,000.

"Connecticut River, Conn.: Continuing improvement below Hartford, $75,000.

"Greenwich Harbor, Conn.: Completing improvement, $14,000.

"East River, N. Y.: Continuing improvement, $2,100,000.

"Hudson River Channel, New York Harbor, N. Y.: Continuing improvement, $400,000.

"Newark Bay and Passaic River, N. J.: Continuing improvement, $150,000.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order on the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves the previous question and the gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order, which he will state.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, my point of order is that the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] is not in order, because the amendment which he proposed is not germane to the provisions of the bill. There are no items in the bill for continuing improvements. Furthermore, the bill proposes an appropriation for a general class of works and projects and it is not in order in a bill for the improvement of a general class of projects to amend by making appropriations for specific projects, designating the projects and the amount to be appropriated. I will say to the Chair that in the Committee of the Whole an amendment was offered providing for certain specific appropriations to be added to the language of the first section, and the point of order was made by me in the Committee of the Whole and was not sustained. In that case the language used was not that used by the gentleman from North Carolina in this instance. In this instance the gentleman from North Carolina seeks to write into the first section of this bill appropriations for continuing improvements, whereas the language of the section reported by the committee is—for the preservation and maintenance of existing river and harbor works, and for the prosecution of such projects heretofore authorized as may be most desirable in the interests of commerce and navigation.

That certainly is not the same language as "continuing improvements," and I submit that the amendment is not germane.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is disposed to think that a general clause making a general appropriation for the "prosecution of such projects heretofore authorized as may be most desirable in the interests of commerce and navigation" could fairly be amended by specifically mentioning projects which are now under construction by the department, and as the Chair understands this present amendment is confined to existing projects, the Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa ordering the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 115, nays, 207, not voting 106, as follows:

SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 23, 1920.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou art the author of peace and of righteousness. Thou art the God of order. Thy laws are over all Thy works and our highest achievement is to bring our activity of life into harmony with Thy will. In this sacred moment at the beginning of a new day we lift our hearts to Thee asking for guidance and for blessing, that we may have our hearts open to every impression of Thy spirit and be led to-day by the Truth that God reveals to us. We ask it for Christ's sake. Amen.

On request of Mr. CURTIS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

LANDS IN KLAMATH COUNTY, OREG.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I present Senate joint memorial No. 6 of the Oregon Legislature, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the appropriate committee.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Oregon Legislative Assembly—special session, 1920—senate joint memorial No. 6—introduced by Senator Ritner (by request of American Legion) and read January 14, 1920.]

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled:

That whereas Congressman SINNOTT, of the third congressional district of the State of Oregon, has introduced a bill which is now pending in the Congress of the United States, having for its purpose the restoration to entry of certain lands in Klamath County, Oreg., which provides:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

"SECTION 1. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to determine and make public announcement of what lands in and around Upper Klamath Lake, in Klamath County, Oreg., ceded to the United States by the State of Oregon by an act entitled 'An act to authorize the utilization of Upper Klamath Lake, Lower or Little Klamath Lake, and Tule or Rhett Lake, situate in Klamath County, Oreg., and Goose Lake, situate in Lake County, Oreg., in connection with the irrigation and reclamation operations of the Reclamation Service of the United States, and to cede to the United States all the right, title, interest, and claim of the State of Oregon to any and all lands recovered by the lowering of the water levels or by the drainage of any or all of said lands' (general laws of Oregon, 1905, p. 63) may be uncovered and opened to agricultural development by drainage, or diking, not impairing the use of the portions of said lake, which do not cover title or marshlands for storage of water or irrigation in connection with the Klamath reclamation project.

"SEC. 2. That title to all said lands can be acquired by homestead entry under the general homestead laws and the provisions of this act, and not otherwise. That in opening said lands for homestead entry the Secretary of the Interior shall provide for the disposition thereof to said soldiers, sailors, and marines in one 160-acre tract to each entryman, by drawing, under general rules and regulations to be promulgated by him: Provided, That the rights and benefits conferred by this act shall not extend to any person who having been drafted for service under the provisions of the selective-service act shall have refused to render such service or to wear the uniform of such service of the United States.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. PHIPPS. I send to the desk a copy of a resolution adopted by the board of directors of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, and also resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Pueblo, Colo., which I desire to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Washington, D. C., January 21, 1920.

Hon. LAWRENCE C. PHIPPS,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The board of directors of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States on January 20, 1920, unanimously adopted preambles and a resolution expressing its views with respect to the urgency of action upon the treaty of peace with Germany and with respect to the principles which should be followed in taking action.

By request of the board of directors, I am placing these preambles and the resolution before you, through inclosure with this letter, and ask that they have all possible consideration from you.

Very truly, yours,

H. L. FERGUSON, President.

"Whereas the progress and the safety of the world demand it; and

"Whereas in order that the vital interests of the United States and its nationals in Europe may be fully protected and the attention of our Government and our people may be concentrated upon our domestic problems, it is essential that the peace treaty be ratified immediately: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the board of directors of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America hereby urge the President and the Senate to take prompt action with respect to the treaty of peace with Germany, with such reservations as will fully safeguard every fundamental principle of the Government of the United States."

PUEBLO, COLO., January 5, 1920.

Hon. L. C. PHIPPS,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At a public meeting held in Pueblo, Colo., January 2, 1920, the following resolutions were adopted:

"Whereas it is apparent that a strong effort is being made by interests not wholly in accord with Americanism to force a compromise upon the adoption of the so-called League of Nations:

"Resolved by citizens of Pueblo, Colo., regardless of party, in a public meeting assembled to become better informed upon the League of Nations, That we are unalterably opposed to any compromise in any way changing or modifying the Senate reservations and that the Knox resolution declaring peace be adopted.

"Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent to our Senators, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and Representatives of Colorado."

The foregoing resolutions were adopted by a unanimous vote.

JOHN MARKEY, Chairman.

Attest:

J. A. DOLAN, Secretary.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I present a statement from Reed College, Portland, Oreg., in reference to the vote of the faculty on the peace treaty. It is short, and I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REED COLLEGE,
Portland, Oreg., December 18, 1919.

We, the undersigned members of the faculty of Reed College, are convinced of the supreme importance of the ratification by the Senate, as soon as possible, of the treaty of peace with such interpretative reservations as may be proper and necessary to protect American interests, but which at the same time recognize the solemn duty of this country as a world power to assume its fair share of responsibility for the preservation of world peace and justice. We urge the Senators from Oregon to promote this action. We believe that a strong majority of the most intelligent and public-spirited citizens of all parties in the State will support them in favoring a resolution ratifying the treaty of peace with the League of Nations covenant in terms that will make it clearly unnecessary to resubmit the treaty to the general peace conference.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BAKERSFIELD, CALIF., December 29, 1919.

Hon. JAMES D. PHELAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: You have been forwarded a copy of the resolutions passed by the California State Department of the American Legion. You will note that resolution No. 34 expresses the opinion of the California department that the Government should pay a bonus to all men who served in the World War of $30 a month for each month of service. This resolution was very thoroughly debated at the State convention held in San Francisco in October, 1919. Every speaker admitted that in justice the Government should do something of this sort. Those opposing the resolution were simply against a clear-cut statement by the legion on the bonus question and wanted to leave it to the discretion of Congress. The resolution was voted by roll call at the convention and there were 417 votes for the resolution and 102 against it.

At Minneapolis the national convention passed the bonus question back to Congress only after Congressman ROYAL C. JOHNSON, of South Dakota, who was there as a delegate, assured the convention that Congress would consider the statement that the American Legion believed that there should be a provision for adjusted compensation would be sufficient to insure the hearty support of a bonus measure from the Members of Congress.

The advocacy of a bonus or adjusted compensation is somewhat embarrassing to the members of the American Legion, inasmuch as those members will be the recipients of the benefits, but without question 99 per cent of the men who served believe that the Government should pay a bonus and do so without delay. The 1 per cent against the bonus are men in such financial position that they are beyond need. Many of us are not in need of a bonus, but it would be exceedingly selfish to let our own position interfere with the needs of our less fortunate comrades. You realize that many men assumed family obligations before they entered the service, during their term of service, or immediately upon their return, and now find themselves utterly unable to cope with their new obligations.

The reports given by the Morris Plan Banks show that a great number of their loans are made to men who have returned from the service, who have had to mortgage their earning power to meet urgent and immediate obligations. If the Government fails to vote a bonus, it will be placing a premium on draft evaders and slackers, who received the benefits of high war-time wages and were able to buy automobiles and homes, while men who were serving their country are compelled to go into debt to a degree that will hamper them for at least several years in putting themselves upon their prewar footing.

I was chairman of the resolutions committee at the California State convention and a delegate to the Minneapolis convention and I know that it was thought by every delegate present that Congress would give justice to the men who had served. Those of us from California hope that the California delegation in Congress will stand as a unit back of the California Department of the American Legion in its request that the Government give a cash bonus, based upon the length of service.

You will hear it advanced that the men are not capable of taking care of their money if they are to receive it from the Government. That is a vicious and malicious statement made by men who have little appreciation of the fact that those who served were intelligent and capable, and inasmuch as the Government did not allow them to stipulate just what they would do while in the service it would not be wise to attempt to stipulate to them just what they should do now that they are out of the service with their adjusted compensation.

Canada, with its limited resources, has recognized its men and is endeavoring to give them a foothold in civil life upon their return, and it is to be sincerely hoped that our country, the greatest and wealthiest, will not be among the last to give recognition of the services of the men who answered her call in time of need. It is common knowledge that many thousands of men who served in the World War are in very urgent need of financial assistance, and it is a strain upon their loyalty and good will toward their country to overlook their needs at this time.

Yours, very sincerely, THOS. W. MCMANUS,
Vice President American Legion of California.

NEW YORK AND SOUTHERN PORTS.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, we are considering what disposition shall be made of the ships. I present an editorial, reprinted in the Charleston News and Courier from one of the New York papers, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Editorial leader from the News and Courier, Charleston, S. C., of Jan. 20, 1920.]

NEW YORK AND SOUTHERN PORTS.

"In the light of the determined efforts which are being made by New York to prevent by any and all means the diversion of foreign trade from New York through southern ports, it is interesting to note again the congested traffic conditions which exist in New York Harbor. According to the New York Journal of Commerce of last Saturday, 'harbor facilities at the port of New York are so overwhelmed by export trade demands that, in the opinion of underwriters and shippers, commodity deterioration, theft and pilferage, misplacement, and delayed shipments prevail to an extent hitherto unprecedented.'

"The New York Journal of Commerce says that the losses resulting from the conditions which it describes are declared by those acquainted with the facts to be 'appalling.' It states that the congestion is confined to no particular district but prevails generally along all wharf frontages, but goes on to give a vivid picture of the situation in those districts where conditions are particularly bad. Here is the state of affairs which exists in the Chelsea district, along the North River, the Weehawken section, both shores of the East River where are deep-water facilities, and along the 'Atlantic Basin' in Brooklyn:

"In these places goods of all types lie exposed to the elements. Even the makeshift tarpaulin is usually lacking. Cotton bales lie upon the bulkheads with neither covering above nor protection from the soil beneath. Goods in burlap or other types of bagging, packed in thin boards, or, as is often the case, in open crating, are beat upon by wind and rain for indefinite periods.

"Not only are piers and bulkheads generally piled high with vast quantities of unprotected goods, but the same thing is true with respect to lighters. Far beyond the pierheads to which they are attached they swing in long strings. The inspection and surveying officials of one large insurance company asserted that fleets of lighters were literally chained together, fastened to a single pierhead, and left to drift, in one case the radius of the drift being approximately 1,000 feet. It was said that this is in direct violation of the city ordinances, but even more to be deplored was the fact that many of these lighters are loaded either with perishable commodities or with goods which materially deteriorate upon long continued exposure to wind and rain.

"Inadequate protection from the weather is supplemented by inadequate safeguards against thievery. Along certain shore fronts, notably the Chelsea frontage, the thieving elements seem to be in a high state of organization and are no longer content with petty pilferage, but steal by the case or by entire consignments. Entire cargoes of lighters have not proved to be beyond their undertaking, according to statements from sources known to be wholly reliable. It was asserted that the vast quantities of unhoused goods on lighter decks, piers, and barns made protection by ordinary police methods entirely unsuccessful.

"It is said that practically all of the congested goods to be found along the New York water front are for export trade, and as an illustration of how difficult it is to get traffic moved promptly through New York one inspector is quoted as saying that '119 automobiles, according to his count, remained in one spot for four and a half months.' The Journal of Commerce says that 'chaos exists generally in and around the wharves.' Yet in the face of these conditions, New York is determined that the southern ports shall not be utilized if it can put a stop to the movement to bring this about. Her agents, acting for her, are bringing all the pressure they can from many directions to destroy the hopes which exist in the South for the building up of a foreign trade through the South Atlantic ports and for the development of these ports.

"One week from to-day, on next Tuesday, January 27, there will be a hearing before the Senate Committee on Commerce at Washington which is of great importance to Charleston and the other South Atlantic ports. It has been arranged by the Mid-west-Gulf-South Atlantic committee, representing these three sections of the country for the promotion of foreign trade through southern ports, and the Senate Committee on Commerce has promised to give a full day to this hearing. In connection with this hearing Mr. Matthew Hale has arranged for a conference at the New Willard to meet Senators and Congressmen of the Mississippi Valley and South Atlantic States at which the need of continuing export rates will be discussed. A vigorous effort is on foot emanating from New York to annul these rates, and unless concerted action can be got from those who have the welfare of this section and of this movement on their hearts there is danger that the attack from New York will succeed.

"Nothing can be more evident than that New York now has a larger volume of foreign traffic than she is able to accommodate. The statements quoted above from the New York Journal of Commerce prove that. It must be borne in mind that the condition which the Journal of Commerce describes is one which has lasted now over a period of several years, and which during that time has grown steadily worse instead of better. Patriotic citizens all over the country were aroused two years ago to the necessity of opening the southern ports to this foreign trade in order to relieve the dangerous congestion which exists at New York. It is the selfishness of New York which would defeat the movement which, under the able leadership of Mr. Hale, has been making rapid progress in that direction. Charleston and South Carolina in this crisis should give Mr. Hale the support which he requires. This city's business men should send to Washington the strongest possible delegation to represent its interests and the interests of the southern ports at the hearing which is to be held before the Senate Committee on Commerce next Tuesday."

SEDITIOUS ACTS AND UTTERANCES.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I present an analysis of the Nelson or Davey bill and the Sterling bill, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ANALYSIS OF THE NELSON OR DAVEY BILL AND STERLING BILL.

DAVEY BILL IS IDENTICAL WITH THE NELSON BILL—THE NELSON OR DAVEY BILL IS THE BILL RECOMMENDED AND TRANSMITTED TO CONGRESS IN HIS REPORT OF NOVEMBER 14, 1919.

"The Nelson bill purports to prohibit the doing or threatening of any 'act of force' (not defined) against any person or property or any act of 'terrorism, hate, revenge, or injury' (not defined) against the person or property of a Government employee with subversive intent. That is sedition. It also provides for the punishment of 'promoting sedition'—defined to cover the advocacy or justification of sedition as thereinbefore defined or connection with an organization concerned with such advocacy or justification.

"The Sterling bill prohibits advocacy of the overthrow or change of government by force, violence, or physical injury to person or property.

"The Sterling bill seems moderate in comparison with the Nelson bill. Its moderation, however, is a moderation of language and not of substance. It has the same vice of not saying what it really means. It is the more deceptive for less clearly suggesting the excesses to which it will lend itself.

"Both bills are disingenuous. What the authors are after is not the finding of a person who actually preaches violent acts (Sterling bill) or expresses subversive intent (Nelson bill). That person is altogether too hard to find. What the authors are really after is a chance to put up to magistrates, postmasters, and juries the question whether extremist doctrines do not in themselves imply advocacy of force and violence, or subversive intent, and so make their holder jailable. The answer to the question depends on one fact only, a fact outside the record, namely, the liberal or conservative tendency of the person who has to answer it. And the legal percentage of liberals in court rooms seems to be kept down to about the percentage of benzoate of soda under the pure-food law. A jury of a man's peers in a free-speech case means a jury of 100 per cent Americans and who are also 100 per cent conservative and 100 per cent ignorant of the most elementary theories of socialism, industrial unionism, the labor movement, and, if possible, social betterment in general. The very ideals of socialism and communism in their most pacifist forms shock an average jury to such an extent that they mistake the shock itself for force and violence. When you give district attorneys the chance of going to trial on an issue of advocating force and violence or 'intent to change the Government,' they are very nearly as well off as if the crime were defined as mere disagreement with existing conditions.

The Nelson bill, S. 3448.

INTENT.

Section 1. Whoever with the intent to levy war against the United States—

"What is evidence of 'intent to levy war'? An undertaking to organize and drill a band of rebels in a mountain fastness would be clear. That is not the case, however, which will arise. In the practical application of the statute excited prosecutors will persuade excited jurymen to infer 'intent to levy war' from the mere fact of advocacy of extreme doctrines.

or to cause the change, overthrow, or destruction of the Government—

"The preposterousness of the word 'change' in this connection is obvious. Advocacy of the substitution of a commission form of government for government by President, Congress, and Supreme Court—or even of so unfundamental as a change to executive from legislative budget making—would evince a sufficiently criminal intent.

"It does not follow that the omission of the word 'change' would make the provision reasonable. 'Intent to cause the overthrow or destruction of the Government,' of course, does not mean intent to cause violent or unlawful overthrow or destruction. Expression of a preference for constitutional monarchy, for example, at a time when men's passions were heated with respect to the merits of such a form of government, would, as a practical matter, be sufficient.

or of any of the laws—

"The Anti-Saloon League has undoubtedly had lately, and the brewers and liquor interests have undoubtedly at present, the kind of an intent which it is here proposed to make a criminal intent.

or authority thereof—

"Some time ago Macy's department store, in New York City, posted an invitation to sign a petition for the repeal of luxury taxes containing in glaring black capitals this statement: 'Luxury taxes discourage industry and make for unemployment.' It is obvious that such a placard tends to dampen the zeal and ardor of merchants and customers for paying luxury taxes; it would follow, as a natural and probable consequence, that some person thus made apathetic or hostile would now and then evade his luxury tax. Since everyone is presumed to intend the natural and probable consequences of his acts, it follows that R. H. Macy & Co., in exhibiting such a placard, intended to change, overthrow, or destroy the authority of the luxury-tax law.

or to cause the overthrow or destruction of all forms of law or organized government—

"This, like the 'intent to levy war' clause, is a bid for the approval of people who hate anarchy and do not realize the ingenuity of prosecutors in persuading juries to make far-fetched inferences from remote evidence.

or to oppose, prevent, hinder, or delay the execution of any law of the United States—

"During the war Congress appropriated money for the purchase of munitions. Conditions in some of the industries where these munitions were produced were intolerable; the life and safety of employees were needlessly exposed; the hours were long; the wages were low; there was not recognition of the fact that the employees were sentient human beings. It was proposed to organize strikes. This was held evidence of intent to oppose, prevent, hinder, and delay the execution of the laws appropriating money for the purchase of munitions at the plants in question.

or the free performance by the United States Government or any one of its officers, agents, or employees of its or his public duty—

"It is the duty of the United States Government and many of its agents to procure materials. The performance of these duties would be obstructed by strikes in the industries producing these supplies, however proper and legitimate the occasion might be for a strike. And, again, on the familiar theory that persons are presumed to intend the natural and probable consequences of their acts, the organization of such a strike would be presumptive evidence of intent to interfere with the performance by the Government and its officers of their public duty.

FORBIDDEN ACTS.

commits or attempts or threatens to commit any act of force against any person or any property—

"In the case already referred to the proposal to organize strikes against intolerable conditions was held to evince not only intent to oppose, prevent, hinder, and delay the execution of laws, but to include the further element of force—i. e., the inference was of intent 'by force to prevent, hinder, and delay' the execution of various laws, in violation of section 6 of the Criminal Code. Thus a strike—any strike—may be an act of force against both persons and property.

or any act of terrorism,—

"The possibilities attending the introduction of a word like this, with no precise definition, into such a statute are too obvious to call for comment.

hate,—

"The gesture of thumbing the nose may be punished by 20 years in prison and a $10,000 fine if done with intent to change the law by a sufficiently unpopular person at a time of sufficient hysteria.

revenge, or injury against the person or property of any officer, agent, or employee of the United States—

"The Kaiser possibly had as adequate a protection against lese majeste as this would confer upon the President of the United States. But the Kaiser's prime minister most assuredly had no such personal sanctity as that with which it is contemplated to invest the janitor of the Post Office Building.

shall be deemed guilty of sedition.

Sec. 2. Whoever makes, displays, writes, prints, or circulates, or knowingly aids or abets the making, displaying, writing, printing, or circulation of any sign, word, speech, picture, design, argument, or teaching which advises, advocates, teaches, or justifies any act of sedition as hereinbefore defined, or any act which tends to excite sedition as hereinbefore defined—

"There can obviously be no check upon the kind of prosecution to be instituted under this language except the moderation and discretion which the Attorney General will doubtless promise to employ. We shall have courts gravely litigating the significance of salmon-colored petticoats or the wearing of Red Cross buttons in the right lapel instead of in the left.

"With the first set of fine verbs there is no qualification as to knowledge, willfulness, or intent. Supposing that it has been held that the following words criminally justify an act of sedition: 'R. H. Macy & Co. ought not to be punished for declaring that luxury taxes make for unemployment.' Suppose the New York World prints this news item: 'John Smith has been convicted for saying that R. H. Macy & Co. should not be punished for declaring that luxury taxes make for unemployment.' Then the New York World is itself guilty of 'promoting sedition.'

"The second set of verbs is qualified by 'knowingly.' Anyone who 'knowingly' displays or prints, whatever his intent, is guilty. The World may publish the fact that John Smith is indicted for sedition, but not what his alleged sedition consisted of.

or organizes or assists, or joins in the organization of, or becomes or remains a member of, or affiliated with, any organization or society, whether the same be formally organized or not, which has for its object,-in whole or in part, the advising, advocating, teaching, or justifying of any act of sedition as hereinbefore defined, or the inciting of sedition as hereinbefore defined—

"What is affiliation with an organization? What constitutes 'assisting' an organization? What is an organization? What is an organization which is not formally organized?

"It has been held that acts and expressions of members of an organization are evidence of its objects. A member or assister or affiliator can not rely upon an innocent charter or organization agreement. He becomes in effect an insurer of the private conduct of all the members.

shall be deemed guilty of promoting sedition.

"The Sterling bill, S. 3317.

"Section 1. That it shall be unlawful for any person to advocate or advise the overthrow, or to write, or knowingly to print, publish, utter, sell, or distribute any document, book, circular, paper, journal, or other written or printed communication, in or by which there is advised the overthrow, by force or violence, or by physical injury to person or property of the Government of the United States or of all government, or to advise or advocate a change in the form of government or the Constitution of the United States or resistance to the authority thereof by force or violence or by physical injury to person or property, or by force or violence to prevent, hinder, or delay or attempt to prevent, hinder, or delay the execution of any law of the United States.

"A reader of this section unfamiliar with the ingenuity of prosecutors might infer that it is intended to punish only advocacy of the use of force or violence or physical injury to person or property for the accomplishment of certain ends. The accompanying analysis of the Nelson bill has presented illustrations of the kind of far-fetched inferences which ingenious prosecutors, in collusion with hysteria, can persuade juries to make.

"It is intolerable that the determination of the political ends and aims in men's minds should be left to the judgment of their passionate adversaries.

"Sec. 2. That the display or exhibition at any meeting, gathering, or parade, public or private, of any flag, banner, or emblem intended by the person or persons displaying or exhibiting the same to symbolize or indicate a purpose to overthrow by force or violence or by physical injury to person or property, the Government of the United States or all government, is hereby declared to be unlawful.

"The prohibition of emblems symbolizing or indicating sinister purposes is more harmful than their display. Who is going to determine what is an emblem or what an emblem symbolizes? Who is hurt by its display? Does it entail such a danger that it is worth while to punish 10 persons mistakenly for displaying something which is not in fact an emblem, or which does not in fact symbolize any sinister purpose, in order to prevent one futile ill-intentioned display?

"Sections 3 and 4.

"These sections make written matter which violates the preceding sections unmailable and nontransportable. The futility of expecting a Postmaster General or other public official to be less bigoted and less unintelligent in the interpretation of the meaning of controversial doctrines than 12 ordinary jurymen needs no demonstration."

SHIPPING BOARD CLAIMS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. FERNALD. I ask unanimous consent again this morning to take from the calendar Senate bill 3451.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me inquire what the bill is?

Mr. FERNALD. It is the bill I called up yesterday morning for the relief of wooden-ship builders.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3451) authorizing the United States Shipping Board to adjust the claims of wooden-ship builders arising out of the prosecution of the war.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, I had hoped that the brief statement of facts which I made yesterday might be sufficient to warrant the passage of the bill, but some statements were made in the Senate at that time which I can not permit to go unchallenged.

It was stated on the floor of the Senate that the bill had been very carelessly and loosely drawn. To that statement I object. First of all, it was drawn by a Senator who is considered to be one of the best lawyers in the Senate. It was carefully considered for several days by the Committee on Commerce, on which we have as a member the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary and 12 other eminent lawyers of the Senate of the United States. Further than that I have taken the trouble myself to consult one of the best constitutional attorneys in the country, so considered by Senators on both this and the other side of the Chamber. In view of these facts it would seem to me to be entirely unfair and unjust that such statements should go to the people of the country.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERNALD. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator does not mean that the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary was present when the amendments were considered or that he agreed to them?

Mr. FERNALD. I think that Senator was present at the last meeting of the committee.

Mr. NELSON. No; I was not present when the bill was considered by the committee. It was difficult to get a quorum, and the clerk of the committee asked me if I might be counted to make a quorum; but I was unable to be present on account of my duties in connection with another committee. I had no opportunity to vote on the amendments, and they do not meet with my concurrence.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, I desire to make the statement that in the final disposition of the bill by the committee a quorum was present and every member present voted that the bill should be reported as I have reported it, with the amendments.

Having brushed aside that statement, because I believe it ought to be cleared, I wish to say that we seem to forget that scarcely two years ago the country was at war and we were giving to the President of the United States, and very properly so, all the authority that seemed necessary for the carrying on of the Great War. He immediately inaugurated new departments, instituted new bureaus for conducting the war, and among others were the United States Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation. The members of those corporations begged people all over the country to come to Washington to confer on matters which were to be brought before those corporations or departments.

We were appropriating money by the millions and hundreds of millions in those days to carry on the war. We were raising an army of 4,000,000 men. We were getting active in every line of business in the country. The munitions factories, the steel factories—in fact, every manufactory in the United States—was set to work and thousands of contracts were made, entirely invalid, but for the purpose of immediate and speedy action.

With all the preparations that were made for the munitions of war and the manufacture of everything that could help to win the war, we had an army of 2,000,000 soldiers who were being trained on this side of the water, and one of the great essentials in carrying on the war was to get them to the other side. The United States Shipping Board, knowing that emergency and having been told by the President of the United States that it was a most important factor in the carrying on of the war, brought men from almost every State, in fact from every State on the Gulf and the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, to engage in the building of ships. They were told that the Government needed ships, more ships, and more ships, and they were invited and begged and implored to build ships, and every man who knew anything about the building of ships was sent into action; and before any contracts were made they were told that this department was a business organization; that there was to be no red tape about this; that business was to be done in a businesslike way over the table as among business men, and before contracts were even made with these men they were implored to go back home and get busy. I am telling no fiction, Mr. President; but, taken from the files of the United States Shipping Board, letters will be found to men in all parts of the Pacific and Atlantic coasts imploring them to get busy in the building of ships; and, acting on that suggestion, men did start in the building of ships.

They built ways; they got their organizations together; they went to every man who had any property in their immediate vicinity; they went to the banks and organized financially to carry on the building of these ships. The work was begun, and after it was nicely and finally started it was decided that the contract which had been contemplated by the United States Shipping Board was not workable. They had first endeavored to have steel ships, and then it was found that the steel mills in the country were engaged for at least two years ahead, and it was impossible to build steel ships for at least two years. On the other side of the water ships were being sunk by submarines at the rate of 10 to 40 a day, and it was the plea from the other side of the ocean that we people on this side must build ships to get our soldiers and sailors across the water; and, whatever may be said about the conduct of this war, no man has a right to criticize the activity of the Navy in getting our boys safely on the other side of the water. We built ships. It was impossible to build steel ships, and every little wood-ship builder in this country got busy in the building of ships.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. FERNALD. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have not been able as yet to find any written report on this bill.

Mr. FERNALD. I made a report yesterday.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does not the Senator think it would be wise to defer the consideration of the bill until Senators can have an opportunity to examine the report?

Mr. FERNALD. This bill has been reported several days; and it does seem to me that men who have a just and honest claim against this Government, and have been deprived of their funds for 14 months, while others who have been manufacturing all kinds of munitions have had their contracts validated by the Congress of the United States, ought now to have immediate action, and this bill ought to have immediate passage.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the Senator whether the report has been printed?

Mr. FERNALD. I think it has been.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that on the bill itself, calendar No. 334, as printed, there is no notation that there has been a report made upon the bill; and, therefore, if it has been printed, there is a mistake in printing the bill itself, as now on the calendar.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, my bill bears a notation that it was reported by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] on the 21st instant.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, that is a different thing; but the report should be noted upon the bill as reported to the Senate.

Mr. LENROOT. Did the Senator make a report?

Mr. FERNALD. I made a report yesterday.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. FERNALD. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Of course, the report is of no use to the Senate, and throws no light on the subject, unless it is printed and supplied to Senators. I should like to ask the Senator some questions.

Mr. FERNALD. I shall be glad to answer them.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. How many claims are involved in this matter of wooden ships?

Mr. FERNALD. The president of the Shipping Board is unable to determine the exact number of claims. There have been already about 70 adjusted and paid. In the Congress last year there was an appropriation of $55,000,000 to pay these claims.

To go back a little, if the Senator will permit me, in the cancellation of these matters the Government saved about $125,000,000.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understand that claim, but I am trying to secure some information.

Mr. FERNALD. I am trying to answer the question. The appropriation of $55,000,000 was estimated. The shipbuilders of the country were invited to Washington and asked to make a report as to about the amount that was necessary to pay their claims. They estimated a total of $55,000,000 for the payment of the entire bill of all the shipbuilders.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Were these claims presented?

Mr. FERNALD. An estimate of them was made. They were not all presented, but each man simply made his estimate. Then they commenced the settlement of these claims, and it was found that on the basis of the returns from the shipbuilders the settlements by the Shipping Board amounted to less than 25 per cent of the claims of the shipbuilders. In the case of the 70 claims that were settled, it cost only one-fourth as much as it was estimated by the shipbuilders; so that without doubt the amount of $55,000,000, which was appropriated, was at least three times as much as was necessary. Now, it is not possible to tell the exact number, because these men were scattered all over the country, and they were building anywhere from one small ship to very many large ships; but the amount of $15,000,000, estimated to be required to pay the claims, is doubtless more than will be required.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. FERNALD. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. This estimate of $15,000,000 did not contemplate the incorporation of the amendments that the committee has incorporated, which will vastly increase the expenditures.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. FERNALD. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. I thoroughly agree with the Senator's contention that these claims, where they are just, should be settled; but does the Senator agree that this suggested amendment gives any discretion to the Shipping Board in making such adjustments, at the bottom at page 3:

That in adjusting such claims the said board shall include and pay an amount equal to the difference between the actual cost of the yards, plants, facilities, machinery, and equipment provided for use in connection with the construction of ships or barges under contracts with the United States Shipping Board or the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation and the salvage value of said yards, plants, facilities, machinery, and equipment at the time of adjustment less such amount as the contracts specify shall be allowed for depreciation for each delivered ship hull and for each delivered barge.

Does not that make the settlements almost a matter of arbitrary decision?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. FERNALD. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator just a moment to remind him of this fact: This bill follows along the lines of the precedents which have been established already, not only by the Senate but by Congress. It is conceded, and the evidence shows, that millions of dollars of war contracts were made without any authority of law, and made in many cases by officers of the Army and by the Secretary of War over the telephone, sometimes by letter, sometimes by persons who really had no specific authority to contract upon the part of the Government; and yet the Congress passed a bill in the Sixty-fifth Congress, Public, No. 322, which authorized the Secretary of War to adjust, pay, or discharge any agreement, express or implied, upon a fair and equitable basis that had been entered into in good faith, and so forth. I am going to ask that that law be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Public, No. 322, Sixty-fifth Congress, H. R. 13274.]

An act to provide relief in cases of contracts connected with the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to adjust, pay, or discharge any agreement, express or implied, upon a fair and equitable basis that has been entered into, in good faith during the present emergency and prior to November 12, 1918, by any officer or agent acting under his authority, direction, or instruction, or that of the President, with any person, firm, or corporation for the acquisition of lands, or the use thereof, or for damages resulting from notice by the Government of its intention to acquire or use said lands, or for the production, manufacture, sale, acquisition or control of equipment, materials or supplies, or for services, or for facilities, or other purposes connected with the prosecution of the war, when such agreement has been performed in whole or in part, or expenditures have been made or obligations incurred upon the faith of the same by any such person, firm, or corporation prior to November 12, 1918, and such agreement has not been executed in the manner prescribed by law: Provided, That in no case shall any award either by the Secretary of War or the Court of Claims include prospective or possible profits on any part of the contract beyond the goods and supplies delivered to and accepted by the United States and a reasonable remuneration for expenditures and obligations or liabilities necessarily incurred in performing or preparing to perform said contract or order: Provided further, That this act shall not authorize payment to be made of any claim not presented before June 30, 1919: And provided further, That the Secretary of War shall report to Congress at the beginning of its next session following June 30, 1919, a detailed statement showing the nature, terms, and conditions of every such agreement and the payment or adjustment thereof: And provided further, That no settlement of any claim arising under any such agreement shall bar the United States Government through any of its duly authorized agencies, or any committee of Congress hereafter duly appointed, from the right of review of such settlement, nor the right of recovery of any money paid by the Government to any party under any settlement entered into, or payment made under the provisions of this act, if the Government has been defrauded, and the right of recovery in all such cases shall exist against the executors, administrators, heirs, successors, and assigns, of any party or parties: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to relieve any officer or agent of the United States from criminal prosecution under the provisions of any statute of the United States for any fraud or criminal conduct: And provided further, That this act shall in no way relieve or excuse any officer or his agent from such criminal prosecution because of any irregularity or illegality in the manner of the execution of such agreement: And provided further, That in all proceedings hereunder witnesses may be compelled to attend, appear, and testify, and produce books, papers and letters, or other documents; and the claim that any such testimony or evidence may tend to criminate the person giving the same shall not excuse such witness from testifying, but such evidence or testimony shall not be used against such person in the trial of any criminal proceeding.

SEC. 2. That the Court of Claims is hereby given jurisdiction on petition of any individual, firm, company, or corporation referred to in section 1 hereof to find and award fair and just compensation in the cases specified in said section in the event that such individual, firm, company, or corporation shall not be willing to accept the adjustment, payment, or compensation offered by the Secretary of War as hereinbefore provided, or in the event that the Secretary of War shall fail or refuse to offer a satisfactory adjustment, payment, or compensation as provided for in said section.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War, through such agency as he may designate or establish, is empowered, upon such terms as he or it may determine to be in the interest of the United States, to make equitable and fair adjustments and agreements, upon the termination or in settlement or readjustment of agreements or arrangements entered into with any foreign government or governments or nationals thereof, prior to November 12, 1918, for the furnishing to the American Expeditionary Forces or otherwise for war purposes of supplies, materials, facilities, services, or the use of property, or for the furnishing of any thereof by the United States to any foreign government or governments, whether or not such agreements or arrangements have been entered into in accordance with applicable statutory provisions; and the other provisions of this act shall not be applicable to such adjustments.

SEC. 4. That whenever, under the provisions of this act, the Secretary of War shall make an award to any prime contractor with respect to any portion of his contract which he shall have sublet to any other person, firm, or corporation who has in good faith made expenditures, incurred obligations, rendered service, or furnished material, equipment, or supplies to such prime contractor, with the knowledge and approval of any agent of the Secretary of War duly authorized thereunto, before payment of said award the Secretary of War shall require such prime contractor to present satisfactory evidence of having paid said subcontractor or of the consent of said subcontractor to look for his compensation to said prime contractor only; and in the case of the failure of said prime contractor to present such evidence or such consent, the Secretary of War shall pay directly to said subcontractor the amount found to be due under said award; and in case of the insolvency of any prime contractor the subcontractor of said prime contractor shall have a lien upon the funds arising from said award prior and superior to the lien of any general creditor of said prime contractor.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized to adjust, liquidate, and pay such net losses as have been suffered by any person, firm, or corporation by reason of producing or preparing to produce either manganese, chrome, pyrites, or tungsten in compliance with the request or demand of the Department of the Interior, the War Industries Board, the War Trade Board, the Shipping Board, or the Emergency Fleet Corporation to supply the urgent needs of the Nation in the prosecution of the war, said minerals being enumerated in the act of Congress approved October 5, 1918, entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of those ores, metals, and minerals which have formerly been largely imported, or of which there is or may be an inadequate supply."

The said Secretary shall make such adjustments and payments in each case as he shall determine to be just and equitable; that the decision of said Secretary shall be conclusive and final, subject to the limitation hereinafter provided; that all payments and expenses incurred by said Secretary, including personal services, traveling and subsistence expenses, supplies, postage, printing, and all other expenses incident to the proper prosecution of this work, both in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, as the Secretary of the Interior may deem essential and proper, shall be paid from the funds appropriated by the said act of October 5, 1918, and that said funds and appropriations shall continue to be available for said purpose until such time as the said Secretary shall have fully exercised the authority herein granted and performed and completed the duties hereby provided and imposed: Provided, however, That the payments and disbursements made under the provisions of this section for and in connection with the payments and settlements of the claims herein described, and the said expenses of administration shall in no event exceed the sum of $8,500,000: And provided further, That said Secretary shall consider, approve, and dispose of only such claims as shall be made hereunder and filed with the Department of the Interior within three months from and after the approval of this act: And provided further, That no claim shall be allowed or paid by said Secretary unless it shall appear to the satisfaction of the said Secretary that the expenditures so made or obligations so incurred by the claimant were made in good faith for or upon property which contained either manganese, chrome, pyrites, or tungsten in sufficient quantities to be of commercial importance: And provided further, That no claims shall be paid unless it shall appear to the satisfaction of said Secretary that moneys were invested or obligations were incurred subsequent to April 6, 1917, and prior to November 12, 1918, in a legitimate attempt to produce either manganese, chrome, pyrites, or tungsten for the needs of the Nation for the prosecution of the war, and that no profits of any kind shall be included in the allowance of any of said claims, and that no investment for merely speculative purposes shall be recognized in any manner by said Secretary: And provided further, That the settlement of any claim arising under the provisions of this section shall not bar the United States Government, through any of its duly authorized agencies, or any committee of Congress hereafter duly appointed, from the right of review of such settlement, nor the right to recover any money paid by the Government to any party under and by virtue of the provisions of this section, if the Government has been defrauded, and the right of recovery in all such cases shall extend to the executors, administrators, heirs, and assigns of any party.

That a report of all operations under this section, including receipts and disbursements, shall be made to Congress on or before the first Monday in December of each year.

That nothing in this section shall be construed to confer jurisdiction upon any court to entertain a suit against the United States: Provided further, That in determining the net losses of any claimant the Secretary of the Interior shall, among other things, take into consideration and charge to the claimant the then market value of any ores or minerals on hand belonging to the claimant, and also the salvage or usable value of any machinery or other appliances which may be claimed was purchased to equip said mine for the purpose of complying with the request or demand of the agencies of the Government above mentioned in the manner aforesaid.

Approved February 2, 1919.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Not only that, Mr. President, but the terms of the pending bill are not dissimilar from the terms of the bill which was passed at that time. They went still further than that, and in the bill to which I have called attention they authorized the payment upon a just and equitable basis of claims, express or implied, that were incurred in producing chrome and other minerals that were necessary for the prosecution of the war. So we are not going blindly into this legislation. We are doing the fair thing, and exactly the same thing that was done in reference to war and other contracts that were made really informally and without any express authority of law. If it was right then, it is right now that these people should be paid in exactly the same way.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, may I follow up the question by asking the Senator from Oregon if the same language appears in the act to which he is now referring? This is certainly arbitrary. This amendment gives no discretion, as I read it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have not compared the language of the two bills, but the purpose of the bills is practically the same.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERNALD. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. I certainly would agree with the bill as originally drawn; there is no possible objection to that; but these amendments go far beyond the validation-of-contracts bill that was passed by Congress.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Of course, I assume that some amendments will be made to the bill. So far as I am personally concerned, I do not want to open the doors of the Treasury wide to every claim that might come in; but I do feel that these men, who acted in perfect good faith and were complying with the requests of the department, ought to be paid the amount due them.

Mr. LENROOT. There is no controversy about that; but I should like to ask the Senator whether he understands that under the amendment proposed by the committee a man might have entirely completed his contract with the Government and then put in a claim for the salvage of the yard, without any assurance from any representative of the Government that he would ever get another contract, and yet under this amendment every shipyard in this country would have to be paid for out of the Treasury? Does the Senator agree that any such legislation as that is wise?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think the bill goes to the extent that the Senator claims, but he may be right in his construction of it. I shall be glad if he will call attention to the particular provision to which he refers.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERNALD. I yield to the Senator from Florida; yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. I want to say that I do not think the purpose of the amendment was to open the door to any such settlement as the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] apprehends; and, furthermore, I am satisfied that the parties interested here do not ask, under this bill, any different plan or basis of settlement than that which was pursued originally by the Shipping Board in making the settlements of some 70 cases which they have already made. Some five or six million dollars were paid out in the adjustment of those claims, and the people now interested are perfectly willing to have those settlements continue upon the basis which had been agreed upon by the board, and which was actually put into practice originally. They are not asking any different plan of settlement than that. They have proposed certain amendments, however, because after hearings it was suggested that a very strict construction might be placed upon this language which would eliminate the principle of fairness and equity in the settlement of these claims and hold them down to a strict, technical construction of precise language—for instance, whether a given person was an authorized representative of the Shipping Board or Emergency Fleet Corporation.

The chairman of the board would hold, under that construction, that it meant the president or the vice president or the general manager, duly authorized to make contracts. When this work was going on, however, the Shipping Board and Emergency Fleet Corporation sent out representatives all over the country to negotiate contracts for the building of ships, and those men were the representatives of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, although they were not officials of that corporation holding the relation to the corporation that an officer authorized to sign contracts would be required to hold; but they went out as agents of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, and as its representatives in the sense that they were the actual attorneys in fact, duly authorized to make these negotiations, and to give assurances. Now, the men who built the ships depended upon those representatives; and while they were not representatives in the sense that they were officers of the Fleet Corporation, they were representatives in the sense that they were sent out for the purpose of making these representations and these assurances and negotiations, and the men who relied upon those assurances and representations ought not to be deprived of their rights upon a technical objection that these men representing the Emergency Fleet Corporation, duly authorized to negotiate these contracts, were not officers of that corporation.

It is amendments like that which the committee thought ought to be made plain and clear, and therefore proposed to this bill. It is not the purpose of the bill to open the door, as I said, to any different kind of settlements than those which have already been practiced prior to the present organization of this board, and under which settlements some five or six million dollars have already been disbursed. Therefore I say that the amendments to the bill do not open the door, as the Senator from Wisconsin suggests, to the disbursement of larger sums than were contemplated when the Appropriations Committee had the bill under consideration and adopted the estimates of the Shipping Board as to the cost of these adjustments. They actually appropriated the money and provided for these settlements, and yet the settlements are held up, and the money is there waiting on these adjustments. For 8 or 10 months the people concerned have been here pleading for an adjustment of their claims, and they ought to be settled, and ought to be settled now. Otherwise, delay amounts to a denial of justice, and they might just as well have no settlement at all. Many of them will go into bankruptcy before any relief can come.

As to the number of these men, I am sorry the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] has disappeared; but he raised that question, and I would refer him to the testimony given at the hearings by Judge Payne, wherein he gives the number of shipyards that are actually involved. There can not be any more claims than there were shipyards and shipways, and that number is given on page 1 of the hearings, as follows:

Referring to the number of shipyards, there are 77 wood-ship yards; 6 concrete yards, having together 357 ways; 18 yards building wooden tugs; and 9 building barges, making a total of 93 additional ways.

Some of these, particularly as to the tugs and barges and those items, I think have already been adjusted; but there could not be more claims than there are shipyards, and there are only 77 shipyards involved in this whole matter. I wanted to clear that up, because Senators seemed to think that we were likely to become involved in the adjustment of thousands of claims and the expenditure of an indefinite amount of money.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for the observation. It is not a question with me of just how much it is going to cost or just how many claims there are, but it is a question of whether the Government ought to pay its just claims and the just debts which its officers have incurred. It was entirely proper for the Shipping Board to encourage the building of ships and for the Emergency Fleet Corporation to go out and urge and implore and beg men to build ships, and courageous men all over this country were willing to put their money and their efforts into this undertaking. Nobody knows the trouble they ran into, because sometimes the lumber that was needed first, and which was controlled by the Shipping Board, came last, and that which was needed last came first; and they had to keep their organizations of men together for the building of the ships at a great disadvantage. Then, lumber that was supposed to be in the East was found not there, but had to be brought from the West. Then there was great congestion of freight, and the lumber was scattered all over the country, and was dumped from the cars and had to be reloaded. Such troubles as those came to these men who had put their money into these enterprises.

The claims are just and honest, and I do not believe the United States Government wants to repudiate a just claim. It is just as essential that we pay the express and implied claims of the Government as it is that we keep our contract in the issuing of the bonds of the United States. It would be just as fair to repudiate the Victory and Liberty bonds as to repudiate the claims of the honest men who were endeavoring to produce what would help us win the war.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I am sure there is not a Senator who does not agree absolutely with the observations of the Senator from Maine that these bills should be paid. They have gone over an unnecessary period and have not been paid. But it strikes me that the bill with its amendments is so full of limitations and arbitrary rulings that it is going to result in delay rather than expedition. I think a bill of 20 lines, giving power to the Shipping Board to make the adjustments along the lines of the contracts made, without the limitations or arbitrary rules would dispose of the question and dispose of it fairly. I think certain amendments have been suggested to the bill which do not permit of discretion, and the result will be that the Government can not make a fair bargain either way. You must delegate authority to somebody in this world when you want to make settlements. Congress can not make provision to meet the many conditions that are involved in these contracts. I would give the authority to the board to make settlements, subject to review by the Court of Claims, and not attempt to limit them by arbitrary rulings, which, in my judgment, will bring only dissatisfaction.

Mr. FERNALD. In answer to the Senator——

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. FERNALD. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I simply desire to say that I was heartily in favor of the original bill before the committee. I read it over carefully. But when these amendments were brought up I was in charge of the water-power bill on the floor and I could not attend the committee meeting. I was asked if I could be counted for a quorum, and I said "yes," that I was willing to be counted for a quorum. I am heartily in favor of the original bill, but I am not in favor of the bill with the amendments that are engrafted on it by the committee. I can not support those amendments.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

Mr. FERNALD. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. I think there is a great deal of wisdom in what the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] has said. I suggest to the Senator having the bill in charge that all the amendments offered by the committee be stricken out except the one found on page 4, which gives the right of appeal to the Court of Claims to those who have claims against the Government, and that in place of the word "representative," on page 2, line 8, there be inserted the following:

any officer or agent acting under its authority, direction, or instruction.

That would cure the peculiar and narrow construction placed upon the word "representative" by the chairman of the Shipping Board. If that is done, it will leave the bill in its original form, except that it will place a definition on the word "representative"; and those aggrieved will be given the right of appeal. If those changes are made I think there will be but little opposition to the bill. I suggest that to the Senator having the bill in charge.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. FERNALD. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McLEAN. I suggest to the Senator from Maine that if he will substitute the word "approximating" for the words "equal to," in line 24, page 3, it will leave discretion.

Mr. FERNALD. I am very glad to accept that amendment.

Mr. McLEAN. I think that will obviate largely the objections that have been raised. So that line 24, page 3, will read:

Shall include and pay an amount approximating the difference between the actual cost—

And so forth.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, there is some merit in the suggestion of the Senator from Connecticut, but I shall object to the adoption of the amendment suggested by the committee in its entirety unless it is the judgment of the Senate that they want to retain the provisions contained in lines 8 to 14 on page 4.

If I may make a further observation, Mr. President——

Mr. FERNALD. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HARDING. I think all members of the Committee on Commerce are cordially in favor of taking such steps as will enable the Shipping Board to do the just and righteous thing in settling these claims. The bill as originally drawn made ample provision to deal justly with these claimants, the wooden-ship builders of the country. Undoubtedly there are many men who entered into wood-ship building construction on the request of the Emergency Fleet Corporation with assurances that they would be properly protected in an undertaking on the Government's behalf. Nobody in the Senate would wish to interfere with a perfectly just settlement of a claim arising from such a commission. The difficulty about passing the bill in its form as suggested by the committee is that there are some claimants who are not entitled to consideration, and the bill makes it mandatory that the Shipping Board shall proceed to a settlement which takes care of every loss incurred.

Mr. President, it ought to be said that among the scores of patriotic men who entered into the shipbuilding enterprise as a matter of service to the Government there were those who entered upon speculative ventures with the most inconceivable lack of conscience. It has never been magnified in a public way, but I have official knowledge of instances where these enterprises were undertaken, money secured from the Emergency Fleet Corporation to inaugurate an enterprise, and the money was expended on real estate ventures and the platting of town lots rather than the erection of shipyards. It is a discreditable chapter in the history of our strenuous endeavors for war preparation.

All that those of us want to do who are opposing the bill as it comes from the committee is to eliminate features which will make it mandatory on the part of the Shipping Board to settle with those adventurers.

Mr. KIRBY. I would like to suggest an amendment that might relieve the condition complained of by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HARDING. If the Senator will just permit me to conclude, I think I will make the situation a little more clear.

Mr. KIRBY. Very well.

Mr. FERNALD. I yield further to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HARDING. If the Senator in charge of the bill will accept essentially the suggestion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] and restore, on page 2, the provision originally written in the bill, with the addition suggested by the Senator from Oregon, so that it may be established that the enterprise was undertaken upon the advice or request or assurances of an accredited representative of the Shipping Board or Emergency Fleet Corporation, then the Shipping Board will have a basis on which to proceed to make a settlement. It would be a very simple matter to restore the bill so that there would be ample authority for the Shipping Board to make a just settlement.

I think the amendment contained on page 3, relating to prospective profits, might well stand. I like it better than the original provision. But we ought to strike from the bill the committee amendment contained in line 23, on page 3, and down to line 8, on page 4, and leave only a clause which permits a claimant to go before the Court of Claims in case he is not satisfied with the award made by the Shipping Board.

Mr. LENROOT. Does not the Senator think it would be very much better to strike out all of the committee amendments, with the exception of the one suggested by the Senator, and pass the bill as first framed?

Mr. HARDING. I should very much prefer that, although I quite agree that there might reasonably be a modification of the provision contained in lines 4 to 8, on page 2.

Mr. LENROOT. With reference to representatives?

Mr. HARDING. Yes. I think that the citizen of the country who accepted what was presumably the official representations of an agent of the Shipping Board ought to be given consideration. If one who had authority to go out and speak for the board entered a vicinity suited to wooden-ship building and invited the investment of capital by captains of industry in that section to a shipbuilding enterprise, and gave assurance that the investment would be amortized by the contracts which were allotted, I think that, in all justice, ought to be given consideration. On the other hand, if some one entered upon the shipbuilding industry as a mere adventure of war and was not sufficiently thoughtful of his own interests to see that his capital was protected, I do not think it is becoming on the part of Congress to undertake to make him whole, and I do not want to open the doors to everyone who is seeking to reach the Public Treasury to make his adventures whole. It would be a very simple matter to have the bill adjusted so as to provide everything that is necessary, and I would be glad to give it my very cordial support. I could not accept it in the form in which it is now presented to the Senate.

Mr. LENROOT. I shall be glad to support the bill if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] should be adopted and all the other amendments disagreed to except the one as to the right of appeal.

Mr. HARDING. Let me ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he does not think the committee amendment on page 3, relating to prospective profits, is rather better than the language of the original measure?

Mr. LENROOT. I do not, for this reason: In the first place, with reference to the phraseology itself, the Senator will see that it only prohibits prospective profits where there has been no work whatever done or commitments made, but it would permit prospective profits where the work had been merely started.

Mr. HARDING. If the Senator will permit me, I think we ought to retain in the bill the clause, ending on line 3, "that no investment for merely speculative purposes shall be recognized in any manner by said board."

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator think that where they have made an investment in a shipyard, and in a contract there was no provision for profits but only an amortization of costs, we should now permit them to have profits? I want to say to the Senator that no representative of anyone appearing before the committee asked for profits. They were entirely satisfied if they should be made good their losses.

Mr. HARDING. I quite agree with the Senator from Wisconsin that we ought to guard against claims for profits. I thought the provision of the committee covered that.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FERNALD. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. As the bill was originally drawn I was heartily in favor of it; but I quite agree with the Senator from Wisconsin in his reasons for his opposition to the Senate committee amendments. I think if the bill were agreed to exactly as it was drawn, with the exception of the one case mentioned by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], it would be perfectly fair to the Government of the United States and perfectly fair to any honest builder of wooden ships.

Mr. FERNALD. To save any further argument, I am ready to accept the amendment of the Senator from Oregon, which, I think, meets with the approval of the Senator from Utah. I am anxious for action on this measure. It is the most necessary part of the bill which provides that these men shall be permitted to get what is due them, and I am very willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I will state to the Senator that I have no desire whatever to prolong the debate.

Mr. FERNALD. I know it.

Mr. SMOOT. All I desire is to make the bill so that we can defend it anywhere we are called upon to do so.

Mr. FERNALD. I think the amendment of the Senator from Oregon will meet the approval of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I rather think so, too; and I would like to have the Senator from Oregon now restate his proposed amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair must interrupt. The clerks at the desk can not have a bill put through in this way. The amendments will have to be taken up in order and acted upon.

Mr. SMOOT. All I asked was that the Senator from Oregon should state his amendment; and, of course, I knew it would have to come up in the regular order. Then we would know exactly what to vote against and what to vote for. I agree with the Chair that that is the only proper way to act on the amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerks at the desk can not keep a record in any other way.

Mr. FERNALD. That is precisely the way I view the situation.

Mr. SMOOT. With the understanding that we will proceed with the bill and vote against the amendments of the committee until the part of the bill is reached to which the amendment suggested by the Senator from Oregon relates, I think the best thing to do would be to proceed with the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first amendment of the committee will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The first amendment is on page 1, line 4, where the committee proposes, after the word "authorized," to insert the words "and directed."

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand the Senator in charge of the bill withdraws that amendment.

Mr. FERNALD. That was excepted.

Mr. NELSON. It seems to me the proper way is to disagree to it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The next amendment of the committee will be found on page 1, line 6, after the words "United States," to insert the words "the United States Shipping Board or the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation."

Mr. McNARY. I think that amendment should stand.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think that amendment ought to go in, Mr. President.

The amendment was agreed to.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The next amendment of the committee will be found on page 2, line 4, after the word "final" to insert a comma and the words "except as herein otherwise provided."

Mr. NELSON. Is not that a part of the language which the Senator from Oregon proposes to amend?

Mr. McNARY. No; this amendment is necessary, if we are going to retain in section 4 the part giving those aggrieved at any settlement the right of appeal, because the language is that the action of the Shipping Board shall be final "except as herein otherwise provided." It prevents being made negative the right of appeal found on page 4. So it should stand if we are going to give the right of appeal.

Mr. LENROOT. Where there is a valid contractual relation, can they not now appeal?

Mr. McNARY. I think not. It is thought not, at least.

Mr. HARDING. It is the statement of the chairman of the Shipping Board that they can go to court on a contractual arrangement.

Mr. McNARY. There was some conflict of opinion in the Shipping Board with regard to that right, and this was to make it clear.

Mr. HARDING. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The ACTING SECRETARY. The next amendment of the committee is on page 2, beginning in line 4, where the committee proposes to strike out the first proviso, which reads:

Provided, That no claim shall be liquidated or paid unless it is alleged and found to be based upon a request or demand of the United States Shipping Board, the United States Emergency Fleet Corporation, or a representative of them or either of them.

Mr. LENROOT. Is not this where the amendment of the Senator from Oregon comes in?

Mr. HARDING. The language of the proviso must first be restored.

On a division, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McNARY. I desire to offer at this point an amendment, if in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. At this place?

Mr. McNARY. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Very well.

Mr. McNARY. After the word "Corporation," in line 8, on page 2, I move to insert the following——

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me? Had he not better postpone that until we dispose of the prior amendment to the bill?

Mr. McNARY. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The prior amendment was disposed of. It was disagreed to. The proviso was restored and is subject to amendment.

Mr. McNARY. Then I move at the place stated to insert the words "or any officer or agent acting under its authority, direction, or instruction."

Mr. FLETCHER. Where does the amendment occur?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the proposed amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. After the words "Emergency Fleet Corporation," in line 8, page 2, it is proposed to insert the words "or any officer or agent acting under its authority, direction, or instruction."

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I desire to suggest an amendment to the amendment. I think I can clarify the amendment. I propose, on line 8, page 2, to strike out the words "or a representative of them or either of them" and substitute therefor the following:

Or any officer or agent acting under its authority, direction, or its instruction.

Mr. McNARY. I accept the amendment to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed to the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 2, line 8, after the words "Emergency Fleet Corporation," strike out the words "or a representative of them or either of them" and in lieu insert the words "or any officer or agent acting under its authority, direction, or its instruction."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. State the next amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The next amendment is, in line 9, page 2, after the word "Provided," to strike out the word "further."

Mr. LENROOT. That should be disagreed to now.

The amendment was rejected.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The next amendment is, on page 2, line 12, where it is proposed to strike out the words "approval of this act," and to insert in lieu thereof "the date when this act shall become a law."

The amendment was agreed to.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY: The next amendment is in line 16, page 2, after the words "good faith," to strike out the words "and upon assurances by a representative of the Government that reimbursement would be provided for in money or contracts for additional work."

Mr. HARDING. This amendment by the committee ought to be rejected in order to restore the original language of the bill for amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARDING. In order to make this language conform to the previous language of the section I move to strike out the words "a representative of the Government," in lines 16 and 17, and substitute therefor the words "the United States Shipping Board, the United States Emergency Fleet Corporation, or any officer or agent acting under its authority, direction, or its instruction."

Mr. FERNALD. I accept that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out, in lines 16 and 17, on page 2, the words "a representative of the Government" and insert the words "the United States Shipping Board, the United States Emergency Fleet Corporation, or any officer or agent acting under its authority, direction, or its instruction."

Mr. FLETCHER. May I suggest the correct name? The United States Shipping Board and the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation are the correct names.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me? The word "their," after the words "Emergency Fleet Corporation," should be substituted for the word "its," so that it will apply to both the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation. I move as an amendment to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Ohio to substitute the word "their" for the word "its" in two places in both amendments.

Mr. FLETCHER. The only question is whether we shall make it necessary that the agent shall represent both the Shipping Board and the Fleet Corporation or either of them.

Mr. NELSON. "Their" or "either of them" would be satisfactory.

Mr. FLETCHER. That would cover it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated as modified.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Beginning on line 16, page 2, at the end of the line, strike out the word "a" and in line 17 strike out the words "representative of the Government" and insert in lieu thereof the words "the United States Shipping Board, the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, or any officer or agent acting under their authority, direction, or their instruction, or under the authority, direction, and instruction of either of them."

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. HARDING. Since the suggestion has been made by the Senator from Florida as to the legal title of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, I want to inquire if we had better not amend line 7 so that in the previous expression we shall allude to it as the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation?

Mr. FLETCHER. That is the proper name. It is the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the proposed amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. After the words "United States," in line 7, on page 2, insert the words "Shipping Board."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 2, line 22, it is proposed to strike out the words "and prior to November 12, 1918."

Mr. HARDING. It was the general understanding that amendments like this should be disagreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed, in lines 24 and 25 on page 2, and lines 1, 2, and 3 on page 3, to strike out beginning with the words "and that no profits" and ending with the words "by said board" and to insert in lieu thereof:

And provided further, That no prospective or possible profits of any kind shall be allowed on account of any ships or barges or other work contracted for on which no work has been done or commitments made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment.

[Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. FLETCHER. I should like to have a division on agreeing to the amendment. It seems to me that is an important amendment and ought not to be defeated. It simply refers to a situation that might mean that those yards which actually did not turn out any ships and did not do any work would get compensation, whereas the yards that actually built ships would have no sort of compensation for the ships they did build.

Mr. LENROOT. Would not their contract take care of that?

Mr. FLETCHER. I am not sure that it would. If it would, that is all they want. In other words, I do not want to penalize the diligent, energetic shipbuilder and put him on a footing with a man who did not actually build a ship. I want to have it understood that it does not exclude the man who actually constructed ships from making a profit on those ships.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask whether Judge Payne did not testify before the committee that where they had a contract that was canceled in making the adjustment they could allow as part of the damages prospective profits?

Mr. FLETCHER. If that is the understanding I have no objection to the rejection of the amendment. It was simply to cover a situation such as I mentioned that the amendment was proposed, and it should not be defeated unless it is understood in that way.

The amendment was rejected.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The next amendment is, on page 3, line 11, after the words "nor the right," where it is proposed to insert the words "of the United States Shipping Board or the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation."

The amendment was agreed to.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The next amendment is, on page 3, after line 22, where it is proposed to insert the following language:

That in adjusting such claims the said board shall include and pay an amount equal to the difference between the actual cost of the yards, plants, facilities, machinery, and equipment provided for use in connection with the construction of ships or barges under contracts with the United States Shipping Board or the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation and the salvage value of said yards, plants, facilities, machinery, and equipment at the time of adjustment, less such amount as the contracts specify shall be allowed for depreciation for each delivered ship hull and for each delivered barge: Provided further, That in the event any claimant shall be dissatisfied with any allowance or award made by said board pursuant hereto, such claimant may appeal therefrom with respect thereto to the Court of Claims, which is hereby given jurisdiction to make such allowances and awards, in the case of such appeals, as it may deem just and equitable.

Mr. McNARY. I move to amend the committee amendment by striking out that portion commencing with the word "That," on line 23, page 3, and ending with the word "barge," on page 4, in line 8.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 4, line 15, beginning with the word "That," it is proposed to strike out all down to and including the words "in the manner aforesaid," in line 3, page 5, and to insert:

And provided also, That the board shall promptly pay all pending undisputed claims and all undisputed portions of pending claims and.

The amendment was agreed to.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to add a new section to the bill, to be known as section 2, as follows:

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the United States Shipping Board, either directly or through the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, to adjust promptly all claims of wooden-ship builders based upon legal liability created by contracts under which vessels have been constructed and based on contracts which have been canceled by the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation; and in making such adjustments due consideration shall be given to the conditions under which the contracts were entered into and the conditions under which the work of construction was performed resulting from the orders or directions of the President of the United States and any officer, board, or agency appointed or created by him or under his direction, or resulting from orders or directions of the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation or the Shipbuilding Labor Adjustment Board, or any representative of either thereof, and such adjustments of claims of legal liability shall be made without regard to any claim submitted under section 1 hereof.

Mr. FERNALD. I move to reconsider the vote whereby we struck out from line 15 on page 4 down to and including line 3 on page 5. It was understood that that language should be retained.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. I had no objection to a reconsideration, but I want to call the attention of the Senator from Maine to the objection that was raised in the committee to the language of the text. The proviso beginning in line 17 would seem to charge the board, in arriving at the amortization to be allowed, with treating a plant in every case as scrapped and they would not be permitted to treat its full value as a going concern. If that language is to be retained, there should be an amendment covering its value as a going concern. So I think we could strike this whole language out and yet the board could take into consideration all these matters.

Mr. FERNALD. If there were nothing in its place, it would seem to me to leave the matter in a quite unsatisfactory shape for a settlement. If there were some amendment——

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, yes; then the board would take the whole matter and allow such amounts as it deemed just and equitable under the first section of the bill.

Mr. FERNALD. The Senator suggests that we strike this out entirely?

Mr. LENROOT. Strike it out entirely. I am afraid this limits it against the Government.

Mr. FLETCHER. Would not the Senator's objection be reached by including after the word "any," in line 20, the words "such plant or the"? Then it would read "the then market value of any such plant or the lumber or materials."

Mr. LENROOT. That is all right.

Mr. FERNALD. I think that would cover it.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think we had better leave it in. I move that amendment to the whole paragraph. The first question is on disagreeing to the committee amendment to strike out, I understand. Does the Senator from Maine desire the committee amendment which strikes out the paragraph to be disagreed to?

Mr. FERNALD. The amendment which the Senator suggested was acceptable.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then the Senator from Maine desires that the committee amendment striking that language out of the bill shall be disagreed to and the language shall remain in the bill, and then we will amend that language?

Mr. FERNALD. That is right.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, may I make this clear? If the Senate wants to complete this bill and carry out the program on which we are essentially agreed, we must first reject the committee amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely.

Mr. HARDING. And then it is open to the suggested amendment of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely.

Mr. LENROOT. It is open to amendment now. We may perfect before we strike out.

Mr. FLETCHER. The first question is, Shall the committee amendment be agreed to?

Mr. LENROOT. I suggest that the amendment of the Senator from Florida is in order. It is always in order to perfect an amendment before a motion is made to strike out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is true.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then I move first to insert, after the word "any" in line 20, the words "such plant or the," so that it will read:

The then market value of any such plant or the lumber or materials on hand—

And so forth.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Before the word "materials," on line 20, it is proposed to insert the words "such plant or the."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the amendment of the committee to strike out.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The last amendment, section 2, has been read. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I shall vote for this bill with pleasure. We hear a vast deal about economy. I knew a man once who economized by escaping the payment of his just debts, but I do not believe the Federal Government should attempt to economize in that way. The way to have citizens love this Republic, and spring to its frontiers when it is in trouble, is to have the Republic pay its just debts. The Democratic Party to-day stands convicted of inefficiency in the matter of liquidating this war. The Republican Party is equally guilty of gross inefficiency in liquidating the war.

Here is the treaty of peace "lodged" in the Senate. The other nations are making forward moves looking toward liquidating the Great War, whilst partisan politics dominate our country and candidates for President are bombarding the circumambient atmosphere thinking they are going to get elected on a speech, whereas they could promote their chances by doing their duty here. We are not making a good record on this side of the Chamber and you are not making a good record on the other side. We are thinking only of politics in this day when action is required. So, Mr. President, I welcome this bill and all others like it that seek to liquidate the recent war.

The League of Nations convened on the 16th instant. The country inhabited by the Ottoman Turk was conspicuous by its absence from the league. Germany was not represented, Russia did not answer, and we were conspicuous by our absence. I do not mean by that set of circumstances to infer that the Senate should ratify the treaty as it is written, because that can not be done. Men who indulge in the luxury of thinking know that the treaty can not be ratified as it is written. So much for that. Why, therefore, it is asked, does not the President recede? He can not recede as a matter of honor. Therefore it is the duty of the Senate, without regard to what the President thinks or does not think, manfully, courageously to press forward and ratify the treaty in the form in which the Senate thinks it should be ratified. That is the duty of the Senate to-day; but here we are planning, scheming, plotting as to who is going to be the next President, and all of us demonstrating that none of us is fit to be President.

Very recently the New York World announced to the country that a certain man who is not identified with any political party should be nominated for President. I was amazed at the popularity and the enthusiasm that greeted his name, although he will never be President. He will never be nominated. The enthusiasm and the admiration for his candidacy arises not because he lived in England some years; it arises not because he can talk luminously and write history well; but the admiration and the enthusiasm of the American people for his name arises simply, solely, and only because he can do the duty of the hour instead of talk about it.

We have some 15 or 20 men in the Senate who want to be President. There is no reason why the Vice President of the United States or some United States Senator should not be the next President; but we must begin, if we are going to be taken seriously by the country, to demonstrate that we can do business.

Consider France, which has one-third of the population of the United States. She was bled white by war. France within one year after the armistice filled in 74,000,000 cubic yards of excavated earth. France within that one year rebuilt 93 per cent of her double-track railroad, or 900 miles. France within one year rebuilt 90 per cent of her single-track road, or over 400 miles. She had 550,000 homes, mostly built of stone, destroyed during the war, and within one year she rebuilt 60,000 of them, and is now in process of rebuilding 96,000 more, or 156,000 in all. France during the war had 1,100 bridges and tunnels completely destroyed, but she has permanently rebuilt 550 of them. These figures translated into other terms mean that France, with one-third the number of our people, has done vastly more work than the United States has done during the past year. And what have we done? Filled the air with talk and filled the corners with schemes and plots and plans as to who is to be the next President!

It is time that the two great political parties began to liquidate the war, began to make good some of the promises we gave during the war, began to pay the just debts incurred during the war, and I regard this bill as one that is a progressive step, because it looks toward the discharge of the obligations we incurred in the war.

Our land is filled with discontent and with shoutings, whilst other nations are working. News is even now coming over the cables that Russia is thinking of going to work! The Germans have gone to work. Here we sit with the treaty "lodged" in the Senate, eagerly listening to hear what the White House whispers as to how we should vote! What kind of statesmanship is that? We should to-day take up the treaty, appreciating full well that the President can not recede if he desired to. Shame on him if, after sitting for months at the table with our allies and making that treaty, he then would quietly and under cover say to us, "Yes; go ahead and carve the heart out of the treaty, and I will pretend to our allies that I am sorry about it, but can not prevent it"! The President is manfully and honorably doing just what he ought to do, standing by our allies, and here we sit, knowing that he will never change his mind on the treaty; that he can not change his views on the subject if he wanted to, because honor prevents him from doing it. We should therefore delay no longer.

January, 1919, went by; the ides of March came; the ides of July and November passed; the autumnal leaves fell thicker than presidential candidates. The snows of winter came again, found us planning, "politicking," and disgusting the American people.

The Constitution lays a duty upon us regarding treaties. Are we going to discharge that duty according to our own views or the views of some one else? Let us therefore sit here and vote and vote and vote until we ratify something; and I give you now the assurance that no one will be more pleased than the President when we show him that we are able to do something constructive without asking his permission. He would be one of the most delighted individuals in our country to discover that the Senate could do something without finding out in advance what he thinks about it. Such action on our part would make him admire the Senate.

If you want men to respect you in this world, do not ask them what they think; think what you think. Do not ask another man what he thinks about something; think what you think yourself and then act upon it. But here we sit, unable to get a vote on the treaty, because, forsooth, we do not know what another man thinks—a beautiful commentary on the United States Senate! Shades of Roscoe Conkling and Ben Hill and Lamar and Webster! If we go to the country, my fellow Senators, with this war unliquidated, with no more forward step than we have made to date, we will find out what the American people think.

I am proud of the Senate. I want to continue to be proud of the Senate. I want to remain here as long as I may; but who will be proud to remain in a body which ties up a peace treaty for many months, unable to proceed, forsooth, because it does not know how some other man may think?

I thought to-day, therefore, whilst I was in such good humor and had a few minutes to spare, I would say a word on these subjects. I am glad this bill is here. There are other bills of like character that ought to be here. I repeat, if you want citizens of the United States to love the United States, let the United States pay its debts, not only its financial debts but its moral and its physical debts.

What have we done for the private soldier? The bill providing the bonus for the soldier—where is that? In the limbo of things that are dead. Where is the soldier settlement bill? My party is responsible just as much as yours for this situation, sir; and this is not a partisan speech. Where is the soldier settlement bill? Dead beyond hope of resurrection. Where is the bill appropriating, or lending rather, $250,000,000 to build up the irrigation systems of the West? It has been struck a fatal blow.

Let me discuss for a moment the bill introduced by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], a statesman of large view. He does not belong to my party. I think he would be a better man if he did belong to my party. He introduced a bill appropriating—no; I will not use the word "appropriating"—proposing to lend to the arid and irrigable States $250,000,000, to be repaid to the Federal Government, and this $250,000,000 is proposed to be used for the purpose of continuing the construction of irrigation projects heretofore begun and for the purpose of commencing the construction of irrigation projects that may be found feasible by the Secretary of the Interior. The governors of western States, some 15 or 20 in number, came here. They were told, Mr. President, that this $250,000,000 could not be loaned to the farmers, although it would easily be repaid, because it might be necessary to feed Europe this winter! That is the statement that was given to us—no money with which to finance our own farmers, no money to lend to our farmers! It must be given to Europeans.

So, Mr. President, let us pause and see what we have done in this regard. Economy? Economy? Why, yes; we all favor economy when we are in the minority. Let us just see what we have done in regard to ladling out the money of our people to other countries, and then I want to put into juxtaposition with it the statement that we can not lend to our own farmers this $250,000,000!

In round numbers we have loaned the following sums of money:

To Belgium, $343,445,000.
To Cuba, $10,000,000.
To Czecho-Slovakia, $55,330,000.
To France, $3,047,000,000.
To Great Britain, $4,277,000,000.
To Greece, $48,000,000.
To Italy, $1,620,000,000.
To Liberia, $5,000,000. There are 40,000 civilized people in Liberia and two and a half million savages. Our Government lent them $5,000,000, but it has not a cent to loan our own farmers.
Roumania, $25,000,000.
To Russia, land of Trotzki and Lenin, the murderers who sink their teeth into the flesh of humanity; Russia, with blood dripping from her lips, looking for some one else to destroy. We have ladeled out to Russia $187,000,000; and yet, when our farmers want to borrow $250,000,000 and pay it back in 10 years we are told that we have got to have money to take care of Europe first!
To Serbia, $26,780,000.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield; certainly.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The Senator does not mean to convey the impression, does he, that we have loaned $187,000,000 to the Bolsheviki in Russia? Was not this money loaned before the revolution of March, 1917, arose?

Mr. ASHURST. No. I will say to my learned friend that some of that money was loaned as late as—now, let me see: The Russian revolution took place officially about the time when many revolutions take place, about the 17th of March, 1917. At that time Nicholas Romanoff was driven off the throne and the provisional government established. The Bolsheviki established their supremacy about the 1st day of November, 1917. It may be—and I think the Senator is correct—that a large part of the money we loaned to Russia, if not all thereof, was actually advanced to Russia before the Bolsheviki took control, so I stand corrected as to that.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If I may venture to speak in the language of assurance, the Senator is correct. We have loaned no money to these men that the Senator has properly described as murderers, Lenin and Trotski, nor any of their régime. All the money that was loaned to Russia was loaned before that band got control.

Mr. ASHURST. I think that is correct, so I withdraw the statement; but I have no doubt that if Trotski and Lenin were to make the right kind of moves, and would sing the right sort of tune, Trotski and Lenin would be just as likely to get a loan as would the American farmer, from what I have seen taking place here. So while it is true that we did not lend money to the Trotski and Lenin régime, let me ask, Who is going to pay back that loan if they do not? Whence will come the money to repay it if they do not repay it? And repaying loans is not in their catechism.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARDING. I dislike to interrupt the Senator——

Mr. ASHURST. I am glad to have the Senator interrupt me, because I regard his interruption as possibly the best part of my speech.

Mr. HARDING. But if the Senator will recall his admonition, at the beginning of his remarks, that we should fulfill our contracts, and will just give us two minutes, we will have this bill out of the way before the 2 o'clock ban comes on. Would the Senator mind doing that?

Mr. ASHURST. Two minutes to 2? The Senator's watch is very different from mine.

Mr. HARDING. No; I say we can dispose of it in two minutes.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I do not wonder that the Senator from Ohio dislikes to hear this speech. I do not wonder that he asks that I stop it. He and other presidential candidates have been equally guilty of a lack of constructive statesmanship on the treaty, and no wonder he prefers not to hear this speech.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, the Senator from Arizona has very much misconstrued me. I am not only delighted, I am elated over the speech of the Senator from Arizona, and the last thought I could have in the world would be to interrupt the flow of his illuminating eloquence.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator is a good judge of speaking; I can see that. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDING. I am not only a good judge of speaking but I rejoice at certain things going into the RECORD from the Senator's viewpoint.

Mr. ASHURST. As an evidence of that, the Senator would like to have them shut off.

Mr. HARDING. No. If the Senator will permit me, in all seriousness, this bill must be passed by 2 o'clock or it will go over another day, and in two minutes it can be disposed of. I will ask the Chair not to take the floor from the Senator who is speaking after the pending bill is disposed of.

Mr. ASHURST. That is most generous, Mr. President. I am so overwhelmed by the kindness of the next nominee of the Republican Party that I think I will quit talking. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDING. I have not lived entirely in vain, then. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Arizona, may I ask for a reconsideration of the vote by which section 2 of the bill was adopted, so that in accordance with the general agreement it may be rejected and the bill go to its passage?

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, has the Senator from Arizona given up the floor?

Mr. HARDING. I so understood.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I shall not be facetious further, and if I said aught that seemed to be improper I hope the Senator from Ohio will forgive me. I am earnestly in favor of the passage of this bill; and I want it to pass before 2 o'clock, and I shall stop speaking in a few minutes.

Mr. KENYON. I simply want to suggest to the Senator from Arizona that a very important bill is coming on at 2 o'clock, and if he feels that he must make his speech to-day, I hope he will not put it over until after 2 o'clock.

Mr. ASHURST. Very well. It was somebody's task to say these sharp things; it was somebody's task to say these things that are very unpleasant to say. It is not at all pleasant to say such things. I have an affection for every Member of the Senate, and I crave their affection. But Senators on the other side are making a poor record. The Democratic Party is making as poor a record as you are making. Great constructive measures looking toward the benefit of the country are delayed. When will we liquidate the war? When will the peace treaty be ratified? No man knows. The majority should make an effort to ratify some kind of a treaty soon.

So, Mr. President, having on this morning made a somewhat unpopular speech, but a true speech, one which every Senator here knows is true, I will conclude with an observation from either Lord Macaulay or Addison, probably Addison, about a certain political upholsterer.

There was in London an industrious man who had a shop, and with that shop he kept his family, not in opulence but in comfort; he even kept a coach, so much were his profits and his revenues from his upholstering. But strangely enough he began to think of what Holland ought to do and what Poland ought to do and what Germany ought to do and what France ought to do and he neglected his shop in order to find time to talk about Poland and France and Holland and Germany.

Then he enlarged the scope of his conversation to Russia, and he so neglected his shop whilst talking about what Holland and Russia and Prussia et al. ought to do that his customers began to fall off. He could not pay his bills; he could not keep his coach; he could not pay his servants. His eldest daughter was taken out of school and went to work in somebody else's kitchen. His son was taken out of school and bound out as an apprentice. His shop was sold at public sale, the coach was sold, the family plate was sold, and he was reduced to complete beggary and his family was sent to the poorhouse, because he insisted that he ought to upholster Poland, France, and Russia, and Germany and the other foreign countries, whilst his own household was reduced to wretchedness.

Let us not, Mr. President, in these parlous times be political upholsterers; let us quit worrying about what some other country is going to do, quit worrying about what other men are thinking. Let what we ought to do be sufficient for us to do. Let us do our duty. Then we will find that we have kept our shop, we have not reduced our constituents to beggary, and we have, in addition thereto, elevated ourselves in the estimation of the American people.

Mr. FERNALD. I move that the Senate reconsider the vote whereby section 2 was agreed to. I desire to have section 2 stricken from the bill.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment to insert section 2 of the bill.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill authorizing and directing the United States Shipping Board to adjust and pay the claims of wooden-ship builders arising out of the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes."

AMERICANIZATION OF ALIENS.

Mr. KENYON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3315, the unfinished business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3315), to promote Americanization by providing for cooperation with the several States in the education of non-English-speaking persons and the assimilation of foreign-born residents, and for other purposes.

Mr. KENYON. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], which has been thoroughly discussed. I ask for a vote on that amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Borah	Chamberlain	Dial
Ball	Brandegee	Colt	Fernald
Beckham	Capper	Curtis	Fletcher

Frelinghuysen	Jones, N. Mex.	New	Sterling
Gerry	Jones, Wash.	Newberry	Sutherland
Gronna	Kenyon	Norris	Townsend
Hale	Lodge	Nugent	Trammell
Harris	McCumber	Page	Underwood
Harrison	McKellar	Sheppard	Wadsworth
Hitchcock	McNary	Smoot	Walsh, Mass.
Johnson, Calif.	Nelson	Spencer	Wolcott

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Forty-four Senators only having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is not present. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Assistant Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. PHELAN, Mr. PHIPPS, Mr. REED, Mr. SMITH of Georgia, Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, and Mr. WILLIAMS answered to their names when called.

Mr. KELLOGG, Mr. MCCORMICK, Mr. EDGE, Mr. ELKINS, Mr. CUMMINS, Mr. FRANCE, Mr. MOSES, and Mr. SMITH of Maryland entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] are absent on official business.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON] are absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may the amendment be read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 3 strike out lines 23, 24, and 25, and lines 1 to 6, inclusive, on page 4, and insert the following:

(e) Require all resident persons, whether citizens of the United States or aliens, 16 years of age or over and under 21 years of age, who are not physically or mentally disqualified and who are illiterate or unable to understand, speak, read, or write the English language, to attend classes of instruction for not less than 200 hours per annum until they shall have completed a specified course prepared by the Department of Education or chief school officer of the State and approved by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That this shall not apply to those who are in this country temporarily for sojourn or business.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, while I have no authority to accept the amendment, I believe it ought to be adopted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, if it is not too late, I ask to have the amendment stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There has been no response. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The reading clerk again read Mr. STERLING's amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. NORRIS. Do I understand the Chair to say that the question is still open to debate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No. The roll call was begun and three names were called, but there was no response, and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] asked that the amendment be stated. The only thing to be done now would be to continue the calling of the roll.

Mr. NORRIS. It would not follow, then, that debate could be had?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Only by unanimous consent. Is there objection? There being no objection, the Senator is now in order to discuss the proposed amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of Senators. I have a provision that I wish to read to the Senate that is not in order now because it is a substitute, and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] has already offered a substitute. I have prepared a substitute for this language, and I should like to have the Senate know about it before the vote on the pending question is taken. I expect to offer my substitute. I would offer it now if it were possible under the parliamentary situation. May I inquire of the Chair if it would be in order for me to do so at this time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. NORRIS. But, as I understand, it is a substitute that is now pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is a proposed substitute.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, I could not now offer another substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not at this time.

Mr. NORRIS. I will be able to offer the amendment when the pending substitute is disposed of, no matter whether the substitute is agreed to or not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If it is agreed to, other matter could be substituted; but if it is defeated, the Senator's offer would be of an amendment to the text of the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. It would be a substitute for the original text. There is a great deal of dispute as to just what ought to be contained here. I am not going over what I said yesterday, but it does seem to me that we ought not to require a State, in order to get any of this money, to provide for a compulsory system of education for grown people. As soon as the parliamentary situation is such that I can offer it, I propose to offer as a substitute that which I shall now read:

Provide by general law for free public schools in the English language that can be attended for at least six months in each year by all resident children of school age, and provide by law for free schools that can be attended by residents of the State of any age who are unable to speak, read, or write the English language, where instruction in English language can be received for not less than 200 hours per annum.

That would relieve what to my mind and I think what probably in the minds of a great many other Senators is particularly objectionable in the original text and in the substitute.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Nebraska includes resident illiterates, does it not?

Mr. NORRIS. The first part of it, "children of school age," includes everybody that is of school age.

Mr. HARRISON. I merely desire to get the position of the Senator. I understood him to say yesterday in a colloquy with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] what I read from the RECORD:

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I want to get clearly in my mind the Senator's position—

Speaking to the Senator from Nebraska—

Would he leave the illiterates out of the bill entirely?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I would.

I thought, perhaps, the Senator was going to offer an amendment that would leave the illiterates entirely out of the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator will agree with me now, when he considers the amendment I am going to offer if I get an opportunity, that I have, in effect, left the illiterates out, excepting that the States must provide a law for children of school age; that they must be free to attend school for six months in the year. In that class is included all who are residents and who are within the school age provided for by the State laws. That would include illiterates and it would include foreign-born and native-born children just the same. But when it comes to the other part, where we provide schools—presumably evening schools—to teach the English language illiterates are not included in that provision. If the Senator will allow me to read it again, I will show clearly that they are omitted and that the schools for grown people are confined entirely to instruction in the English language. It reads:

Provide by general law for free public schools in the English language that can be attended for at least six months in each year by all resident children of school age, and provides by law for free schools that can be attended by residents of the State of any age who are unable to speak, read, or write the English language, where instruction in the English language can be received for not less than 200 hours per annum.

Mr. HARRISON. That removes the compulsory feature of the bill, does it not?

Mr. NORRIS. It entirely removes the compulsory feature of the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Providing for six months' schooling?

Mr. NORRIS. The State must provide for six months' schooling for its children of school age, regardless of whether they are foreign-born or native illiterates.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator intend that the Federal Government should make an appropriation to carry out that provision?

Mr. NORRIS. That is, the State must do that in order to get any of this money.

Mr. HARRISON. The Federal Government is going to cooperate with the State, as I understand, by putting up half and the State half. Is that right?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. The bill provides for 200 hours' schooling a year. The Senator's amendment would provide for not less than six months.

Mr. NORRIS. No; the Senator is wrong there, as I understand it. The 200 hours' a year are left in the amendment just as it is in the bill. That applies to people above school age who are studying the English language.

Mr. HARRISON. To what do the six months apply?

Mr. NORRIS. To children of school age only.

Mr. HARRISON. Has the Senator any idea how much that would cost the Federal Government?

Mr. NORRIS. The bill itself fixes the limit.

Mr. HARRISON. It would certainly cost more to include what the Senator proposes to include than it would if left as originally worded.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think so. It would cost much less.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator thinks it would cost much less?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator does not think it would require $85,000,000?

Mr. NORRIS. I have not gone into that, because this does not affect the appropriation or the authorization for an appropriation, one way or the other, of course.

Mr. SMOOT. May I ask the Senator to read the first paragraph of his proposed amendment?

Mr. NORRIS. It reads as follows:

Provide by general law for free public schools in the English language that can be attended for at least six months in each year by all resident children of school age.

Mr. SMOOT. Do I understand the Senator has in mind teaching merely the English language?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; but that the public schools of the State must be English schools and not conducted in a foreign language.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator's idea is to allow teaching of any science or any study in any department of education?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes. I do not want to interfere with the State law on the subject. This, of course, would not apply to a college or a high school or anything of that kind.

Mr. SMOOT. It would apply to primary schools?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Would that be understood by the State to mean that the Government of the United States would pay half the expenses of the running of their primary schools?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no. If the Senator will notice where that is to come in, he will see that it is one of the requirements (e) at the bottom of page 3 of the bill. There are certain requirements in the bill that the law, if enacted, would compel the States to comply with in order to get any of the money. This simply requires that they must have public schools; that those public schools must be free; that they must be open at least six months in each year; and that they must be conducted in the English language.

Mr. SMOOT. Take any State in the Union and consider the conditions existing to-day. There is no State in the Union that has not free schools; there is no State in the Union that is not teaching English in its schools; and there is no State in the Union that does not begin with the primary grades and go up to the eighth grade in its free public schools. As I understand the wording of the Senator's amendment, all the State would have to do would be to adopt this requirement, and, doing so, then the Government of the United States would pay half of the expense of maintaining the schools.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no.

Mr. STERLING. They would not need to make it compulsory at all.

Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. STERLING. But we put the General Government in the position of giving half the money to support the free schools of the States.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I think.

Mr. KENYON. It would not require the teaching of any language, would it?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes; the common schools must be conducted in the English language. The requirement of the bill, for instance, for which I want to substitute this, although there is one substitute pending, is to "require all residents who are citizens of the United States, 16 years of age and over and under 18 years of age, and all residents of more than six months who are aliens, 16 years of age or over and under 45 years of age, who are illiterate or unable to understand," and so forth.

That goes a great deal further. It includes in its original form, as reported by the committee, grown people, and makes it compulsory. That is what I object to. I do not believe that is a practical proposition. Personally, I would have no objection to making the common schools compulsory; but I realize it would be objectionable in a great many instances.

The principal object I am trying to attain in this amendment is that those people who are to be taught English, who can not speak the English language, shall have an opportunity in the State, not be compelled to do it, but that they shall have an opportunity, without expense, to learn the English language.

Mr. SMOOT. I am in perfect accord with the Senator there, as he must have gathered from what I said yesterday.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I think so.

Mr. SMOOT. But I am fearful the first paragraph of his amendment would simply mean that the Government of the United States shall hereafter pay one-half of all expenses of maintaining all of the schools in all of the States.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want to do that.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not think so.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think the amendment does that. Of course, if it does, I would not want it. Let me explain a little further. Here is a statute that comes along and says, "We will give to the State a certain amount of money, but before we give it we will require you to do certain things; you have to enact certain kinds of laws." I provide that one of those kinds of laws must be that they must have common schools that are free and which must be conducted in the English language.

It is true that probably all of the States, at least with only one or two exceptions, already have that kind of a law; but we can require that, even though we pay nothing toward it, before we will give the money to pay for something else. If the Senate thinks the language I have used would bind the Government of the United States to pay half the expense of the common schools, I would be willing to strike it out and leave nothing in except the last clause, as follows:

Provide by law for free schools that can be attended by residents of the State of any age who are unable to speak, read, or write the English language, where instruction in the English language can be received for not less than 200 hours per annum.

Mr. SMOOT. That, I agree with the Senator, is a splendid provision.

Mr. NORRIS. That is what I am trying to reach in the amendment I propose to offer.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest to the Senator that he confine his amendment, when he does offer it, to the second paragraph and leave out the first paragraph entirely.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think that would be the construction; but if Senators fear it would be I do not think I would weaken it any by striking it out. I just wanted to let the Senate know, before we vote on the particular substitute now pending, that in due time I am going to offer this, no matter whether the pending substitute goes in or is rejected.

So Mr. STERLING's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in accordance with my statement awhile ago, I now offer the amendment that I read before. I ask the Secretary to read it, as I have modified it by eliminating the clause that seemed to be objectionable to some Senators. It is a substitute for subdivision (e).

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the parliamentary situation is that that subdivision now has been agreed to. I understand that this can not be offered as a substitute while the bill is in Committee of the Whole unless a reconsideration is had.

Mr. NORRIS. No, Mr. President; a reconsideration would not help it any. I admit that the parliamentary point is good if made against it. I suggested it, however, before we voted on the other amendment. There was not any way for me to get it in while the other one was pending. I agree that a point of order is good against it. I think it was understood when I mentioned it that it would be offered, and I now ask unanimous consent to offer it as a substitute for subdivision (e), which has been agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to granting unanimous consent asked by the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. STERLING. I object.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I give notice that I will offer it as a substitute when the bill gets into the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not understand that subdivision (e) has been adopted. We amended subdivision (e). The fact that we have amended subdivision (e) does not preclude the offering of a substitute for it as amended. If we had formally adopted the subdivision it would not be amendable in Committee of the Whole without a reconsideration of the vote.

Mr. KENYON. We have formally adopted a substitute for subdivision (e).

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. A substitute for the entire subdivision?

Mr. KENYON. Yes; for the entire subdivision.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I thought it was not a substitute for the entire subdivision.

Mr. STERLING. I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota.

The READING CLERK. On page 4, beginning with line 7, strike out subdivision (f) and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(f) Provide, as far as possible, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, for the education of resident persons, whether citizens of the United States or aliens, of the age of 21 years or more and less than 50 years, who are illiterate or unable to speak, read, or write the English language: Provided, That any course of education or instruction under this subdivision or under subdivision "e" shall especially include instruction in American history, the fundamentals of civil government, and the principles of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, just a word in explanation of this proposed substitute. It has already been explained perhaps two or three times on the floor. It does not change very materially the provision of subdivision (f) as it is found in the bill itself. It is simply permissive, however, or persuasive. No State is required to adopt the compulsory education law with reference to those who are between the ages of 21 and 45. It is entirely voluntary upon the part of the State. If the State does adopt provisions satisfactory to the Secretary of the Interior for the education of persons between the ages of 21 and 45, and the State accepts by legislative act the provisions of this bill, then it will apply, and the State, because of the special courses of instruction given to these people, will be entitled to share in the benefits of the act.

It adds this to subdivision (f) as found in the original bill, namely, that instruction is required in American history, the fundamentals of civil government, and the principles of the Constitution; and considering the object and purpose of the bill, namely, the Americanization of those who are not Americanized, it is supposed that it will apply largely to the alien element in our midst. I think it is quite essential to call special attention to these subjects, the fundamentals of civil government, American history, and the principles of the Constitution, and that such persons between 21 and 45 should receive instruction in those things.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I had intended offering an amendment to subdivision (f) as it appears in the bill. I am rather inclined to favor the substitute proposed by the Senator from South Dakota; but the amendment which I had intended to offer to subdivision (f) as it appears in the bill seems to me to be likewise pertinent to the substitute which the Senator from South Dakota has just presented. It is in the first line of the Senator's proposed substitute, after the word "possible," to insert the words "and practicable." The Senator will doubtless recognize the difference in the two expressions, and so as to put it in the conjunctive there it should read "as far as possible and practicable," which, I think, would state the matter very much better.

Mr. STERLING. I agree with the Senator's suggestion, and I accept that amendment to my substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota accepts the suggestion, and the question now comes on the adoption of the substitute as modified.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to move to amend still further the proposed substitute of the Senator from South Dakota by striking out a provision therein which is also included in the original bill. I do not think that the details of this plan should be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. I believe this carries governmental interference into State educational work too far.

The bills that we have passed heretofore, through which national aid was given to State education, prescribed in themselves the line of work that was to be done in the States, the States contributing also, and a report was required to a national officer of the work, and he, when the next appropriation was made for distribution, could withhold it if he found that the funds had not been used according to the plan of the bill passed by Congress. But nowhere was the authority given to the National Government to prescribe rules and regulations for the work in the States, and nowhere was the approval of a national officer required of any details of plans adopted in the States.

I favor national contributions toward educational work, but I am entirely opposed to the National Government interfering with the detailed management of this work in the States. The detailed management heretofore has always been left to the States themselves.

I therefore move to strike from the substitute offered by the Senator from South Dakota the words "subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior."

The subdivision reads:

Provide, as far as possible, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, for the education of resident persons, whether citizens of the United States or aliens, of the age of 21 years or more and less than 50 years, who are illiterate or unable to speak, read, or write the English language.

I think that detailed work should be left to the State authorities.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator who would determine that the 200 hours per year in the study of English had been taken care of?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That would come to the Secretary of the Interior under subdivision (h).

Mr. KENYON. The Senator will make no objection to subdivision (h)?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not going to object to subdivision (h). I think that covers it. I think that the State authorities should report to the Secretary of the Interior each year the work done. The State authorities understand what the bill requires. If the report at the end of the year does not show that the work has been done, then no fund goes to that State that year.

Mr. KENYON. He could withhold the fund?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. He could withhold the fund the next year. It constrains the use of the fund for the purpose defined by the bill.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator is not contending that the fund may be used by the State?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not at all. The State must use the fund for the purpose intended by the bill; but after we require that the fund shall be used for the purpose intended by the bill, I think we should leave the broadest, unrestrained discretion in the State and to the State officials executing the plan. They must use it to do the work contemplated by the bill. I know when we had under consideration our bill for vocational education a great deal of hostility from State officers throughout the country developed to proposed national direction of work in the States, and we eliminated it; and we have found no trouble coming from that elimination.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am opposed not only to the substitute but I am opposed to the particular paragraph in the bill that it proposes to amend. The more I think about it the more I feel as though the bill ought to be defeated if it has this substitute in it, or that part of the bill that the substitute seeks to amend. It seems to me it is a dangerous proposition. Let us see what it provides for.

The State shall be required—

To do what?

(f) Provide, as far as possible——

Mr. STERLING. "Or practicable," according to the amendment accepted a while ago.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; "or practicable." It would be practicable for the Secretary of the Interior to feel that a State ought to have a compulsory law that would require everybody within the State who is illiterate or who is an alien over 21 years of age and not over 50 to attend these schools.

It seems to me that the Government of the United States is going a good way when we appropriate money out of the Federal Treasury to educate illiterates who are 50 years old, and to require the States to provide by law that that shall be done in order to get some Federal funds. There is not a State in the Union that does that, so far as I know. To leave it in indefinite language like this is a mistake. I would feel that it would be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to require something pretty big under this, because it says "provide as far as possible and practicable."

Mr. SMOOT. Is it "and practicable" or "or practicable"?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know.

Mr. SMOOT. Can some Senator tell me which it is?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is "and practicable."

Mr. SMOOT. That is worse than ever.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that is worse than ever. You must go just as far as you possibly can so long as it is practicable. One Secretary of the Interior would say, "Before you can get any of this money you must require every person in your State who is illiterate or an alien, between 21 and 50 years of age, to go to school 12 hours a day 365 days in the year." That is practicable and it is possible. I admit that is extreme; but that could happen under the bill that we are proposing to pass. How far should the Secretary of the Interior go? The law says he shall go as far as possible, and he would have to go some distance to do that.

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. While the word "or" if used as a conjunction here might make it a little more definite as to what is intended, yet I venture to say that where you use the words "possible and practicable" connected with the word "and" that the word "practicable" will modify the word "possible."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It must be both possible and practicable.

Mr. STERLING. Yes; it must be both possible and practicable. It would not be put in operation unless it were a practicable thing.

Mr. NORRIS. A law that would require every person between 21 and 50 years of age to go to school six months in the year is both possible and practicable; nobody can deny that. A good many people would think it was possible and practicable to go further than that; and here we propose to educate the illiterates in the State away beyond the school age.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The legislature of the State would have to determine whether it was practicable, would it not?

Mr. NORRIS. The Secretary of the Interior also would determine it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. But the Secretary of the Interior has no power under the bill to coerce the legislature.

Mr. NORRIS. Not at all; but he can keep that State from getting any of the money unless they comply with what he says is possible and practicable.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Is it not true that if the Secretary of the Interior should be captious, he would certainly find some means for putting the law into operation? Would not the criticism of the Senator apply to any restriction which might be imposed upon the legislature or any requirement which might be imposed upon the legislature?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I do not think so. I think this goes a good deal further than the ordinary restriction that is put on. We are going to say in this bill, "Go as far as possible just so long as it is practicable." We are instructing him to do that. It is a fair presumption that a Secretary of the Interior is honest and square; we ought to go on that theory. What would he do when right at the beginning of the bill it provides that you must require as much as possible so long as it is practicable? There is a great opportunity for disagreement and still to be honest; but everybody must admit that he would have to go a long distance.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. May I inquire of the Senator what language he would suggest to cover the point?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. I would strike the provision out of the bill.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. In other words, leave the matter entirely to the State without any supervision or cooperation on the part of the United States Government?

Mr. NORRIS. In other words, I would make no provision in the bill for the education of illiterate citizens who are over 21 years of age and not over 50. I am not in favor of spending public money to educate people who are past school age.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. From that point of view I can understand just what the Senator means.

Mr. NORRIS. I hope I have made my point clear to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I think the Senator has made himself quite clear from that point of view, but it is the point of view of some of the rest of us that we ought to have some provision for educating illiterates who are above 21 years of age.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes. I am not complaining because the Senator or anyone else holds that point of view, but I want to submit to the Senator that, so far as I know, it is contrary to every system of education. There is a reason for teaching people over 21 years of age the English language. When we invite these people over here and they can not speak our language, we owe it as a duty to them and we owe it as a duty to ourselves to do that much for them, because they then make better citizens, and we avoid, in many cases at least, the development of anarchistic ideas, of anarchists, Bolshevists, and so forth. But there is not a State in the Union that provides for the education at public expense of its citizenship between 21 and 50 years of age.

Mr. STERLING. I think I called the attention of the Senator from Nebraska yesterday to a provision of the statute of South Dakota upon that point. I read the provision, and I thought it was generally assented to that the provision covered the question just raised by the Senator from Nebraska. The provision is:

Provided, That any person or persons more than 21 years of age and less than 50 who do not possess the ability to read, write, and speak the English language equivalent to the requirements for the fifth grade in our State course of study for the common schools may attend during good behavior, free of charge, any of the special classes established under the provisions of this act.

The act having provided for the classes——

Mr. NORRIS. But if he will again read the classes of people who are going to be admitted the Senator will see they are not the ones we have here.

Mr. STERLING. They are exactly what we have here. They are all persons between 21 and 50 years of age, whether aliens or residents, who have the privilege of attending the special classes. Any State, by the enactment of a law such as I have quoted from the statute of South Dakota, with perhaps something additional in regard to the grades or the instruction that would be given, would comply with the Federal statute as here proposed.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator let me have the statute which he quoted?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I will read it again. This law provides for certain schools in South Dakota, and then it says:

Provided, That any person or persons more than 21 years of age and less than 50 who do not possess the ability to read, write, and speak the English language.

That is intended to apply to foreigners, of course, to aliens who can not speak the English language. The illiterates who are here can speak the English language. If they can not speak the English language, the only one they have ever known anything about, then they are deaf and dumb and can not speak at all. South Dakota provided for certain educational facilities and then provided for those people to whom I have just referred in the statute—

Who do not possess the ability to read, write, and speak the English language.

They must lack the ability to do each one of those things. They are connected by the word "and." If they could not read, that would not be sufficient; if they could not write or read, that would not be sufficient; but it must be that they can neither read, write, nor speak the English language in order to get the benefits of it. That is a different proposition from the one we have here.

I have been arguing thus far what I have believed to be the difficulty of the bill and its enforcement as a law if we pass it. I want to give another reason why, in my judgment, we ought not to have that kind of a provision in the bill, and that is that we ought not to provide by law for the appropriation of public funds out of the Federal Treasury to go into the different States of the Union where they have illiterates, grown people, and educate those people. I would like to see them educated, and I have no objection to the State doing it if it wants to.

I am not finding fault with South Dakota; I have no objection to that; but we ought not to take from the Federal Treasury, as I view it, money to educate people who are grown and grayheaded, who ought to have been educated when they were children. The right kind of public-school system is the one that educates the children. You will get into all kinds of difficulty trying to educate grown people. They can not go to school, though they want to, in a great many meritorious cases. They have to support wives or children or families. We do not require grown men to go to school, and yet you are about to pass a bill the effect of which may make that compulsory.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. If that were true, I would agree with the Senator; but the whole face of the bill shows that the Senator is not correct. The philosophy of the bill as originally drawn is to compel aliens to attend the teaching of English for 200 hours a year up to 45, and of citizens up to 21 years of age. By the substitute offered by the Senator from South Dakota that age of aliens is reduced to 21. There is the compulsion that is part of the bill.

Subdivision (e) only extends by compulsion to 21 years of age. Then we pass to subdivision (f), which is in the nature of and intended to be a persuasive statute, that above 21 and up to 50 years of age, according to the substitute of the Senator from South Dakota, the teaching of those aliens and the teaching of those citizens shall be purely by agreement that will be worked out for night schools, or even clubs or private schools. There is absolutely no compulsion in it; and the Senator from Nebraska in arguing as to compulsion must take subdivision (e) in conjunction with subdivision (f) to get at the meaning of the whole section.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator is entirely wrong. I am just as much in sympathy with the main purpose of the bill as is the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator insists that under subdivision (f) it is compulsory education?

Mr. NORRIS. I insist that it may be, and if the Secretary of the Interior thinks it his duty I am inclined to think it will be.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator think it should be?

Mr. NORRIS. No; and that is the reason I want to strike it out.

Mr. KENYON. Why does the Senator think the Secretary of the Interior would try to compel it?

Mr. NORRIS. Because the bill tells him to do so. The bill says, "You must require this State to go as far as possible and practicable."

Mr. KENYON. But the proposed law considers that practical and possible as to compulsion only up to 21 years of age. You have to take the law on all sides and look at the different sections.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that. The bill, as to subdivision (e), in my judgment, is entirely wrong.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment I will.

Subdivision (e) now stands, as the Senator from Iowa says, compulsory up to 21 years of age. That is fundamentally wrong. It never ought to be put in a Federal statute here that we should require the State to do a thing of that kind. But we follow that with subsection (f) and we say that we will require the State, as far as possible and practicable, to provide——

Mr. STERLING. Let me say——

Mr. NORRIS. Let me answer one at a time. I will yield to the Senator from South Dakota in due time. I will be much more courteous to the Senator from South Dakota than he was when he objected to my offering my substitute.

Mr. STERLING. I do not see how the Senator from Nebraska can take that as an act of discourtesy.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, the Senator is interrupting without any reason. The Senator has no right to say anything unless he is recognized by the Chair.

Mr. STERLING. When I am charged with discourtesy——

Mr. NORRIS. He insists on talking without recognition when I have the floor.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska has the floor. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. STERLING. When I am charged with an act of discourtesy to any Senator in this body, then I have the right to rise and protest against language which so charges; and I do protest, because I never thought of an act of discourtesy or meant to be in the slightest degree discourteous to the Senator. I was clearly within my rights. If any Senator was expected to object to the reconsideration of subdivision (e), I had the right to do so, and I know it was expected that I would object. There had been a pretty decisive vote, though showing a lack of quorum, on the matter.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator says that when his lack of courtesy is questioned he has a right to protest, but that right does not extend beyond the rules of the Senate. That right does not give him an opportunity to break in without recognition. I was ready to yield when he went at it in the right way. In other words, I was courteous, but I was not willing that he should make a rule of the Senate to suit himself. The rules provide how one Senator shall interrupt another. The rules do not say that when any Senator here, whether another Senator has been discourteous or not, shall have the right to get up and talk without recognition and without permission of the Senator who has the floor.

Now, I did say that I would be more courteous than he was. I never thought for a moment that the Senator would get, as the fellow said, "all het up" over that. I think I was. I do not think I was shown the right courtesy when I proposed my amendment and called attention to it beforehand, when, as a matter of fact, although the Senator from South Dakota does not know it, I was going to offer a substitute before he offered his, and was asked by the Senator in charge of the bill to wait until the Senator from South Dakota got through, and I did wait.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to find out just what the understanding of the Senator from Iowa is as to section 5; and if the Senator from Nebraska will allow me to ask the Senator from Iowa a question, I should like to do so.

Section 5 reads as follows:

That no money shall be paid to a State until it shall through its legislature—

Then, in subdivisions (a), (b), (c), (d), (e), (f), (g), and (h) certain requirements are enumerated. Does the Senator from Iowa contend that if (a), (c), and (e) are complied with by the legislature money would be paid to the State to take care of those three subdivisions? As I read it, no money shall be paid to a State until all of those subdivisions are complied with—every one of them.

Mr. KENYON. I think that is true.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I think the Senator from Nebraska is right in his position.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator agree with the Senator from Nebraska that subdivision (f) requires compulsory education?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no.

Mr. KENYON. Well, that is the only issue I am making with the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. SMOOT. It is not compulsory upon any alien or citizen between the ages of 21 and 50 to attend the schools, but it is compulsory upon the part of the State legislature to provide that he shall have a chance to attend the school before ever a dollar of the money shall be paid.

Mr. KENYON. To provide, just as is stated there, that those who are illiterate or can not speak, read, or write the English language shall be able to secure this instruction.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; that is as I understand it.

Mr. KENYON. And I think the original intention of that was to provide for exactly the same instruction that you would provide for under subdivision (e), instruction in English. Now, that has gone a little further than instruction in English, and provides that it shall cover history, civil government, and so forth.

Mr. SMOOT. I will speak on that subject a little later, but I wanted to understand just how the Senator from Iowa construed it.

Mr. KENYON. Oh, I thoroughly understand that there is no compulsion under subdivision (f), and if the language can be construed as compulsion there should be a proviso, which I was just trying to indite here, providing that that shall not be. It never was intended.

Mr. SMOOT. It is compulsory on the States, however, to provide the schools, any or all?

Mr. KENYON. To provide some arrangement, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, by which men between 21 and 50, as it is now, or, in mine, 45, can receive this instruction.

Mr. HARRISON and Mr. STERLING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield first to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is so well posted upon this subject that I should like to ask him a question. I have an idea—I do not know where I got it; I probably read it somewhere—that the Bureau of Naturalization has spent some money in establishing schools in various parts of the country for the purpose of giving to these alien residents an opportunity to learn how to read and write. Is the Senator familiar with that?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I am not.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield I will simply say that up to July 17, 1919, 2,815 community schools had been established for this very purpose.

Mr. HARRISON. Under the Bureau of Naturalization?

Mr. SMOOT. Under the Department of Labor.

Mr. HARRISON. Can the Senator from Utah tell us how many students enlisted in those schools?

Mr. SMOOT. I have the complete list here, but——

Mr. NORRIS. I have had the bulletins that show the entire number, but I have not them here.

Mr. SMOOT. At this point, if the Senator does not object, I will insert the communities in which the schools are established, and also the number of students in the schools.

Mr. NORRIS. All right; I have no objection.

Mr. SMOOT. In the city of New York there are over 15,000 students attending these schools established under the Department of Labor to-day.

Mr. HARRISON. Are the Department of Labor requesting any larger appropriations to carry on this work, or do they think they are meeting the situation fairly well?

Mr. SMOOT. I can tell the Senator the amount the Department of Labor are asking for the year ending June 30, 1921. The amount they ask for field service, 70 field employees, salaries, and traveling expenses, is $210,000. That is for employees in the District of Columbia. For statistical work they ask for $40,000; for general correspondence, $50,000; for motion pictures, $75,000; miscellaneous $25,000; or a total of $400,000.

Mr. HARRISON. I will ask the Senator from Utah how long they have been carrying on that work?

Mr. SMOOT. They began the work in 1914.

Mr. KENYON. That is entirely connected with the preparation of men for naturalization.

Mr. HARRISON. Then may I ask the Senator from Iowa a question, because probably he is thoroughly familiar with this matter? I am seeking information now, because I am sure no Senator here wants to duplicate the work of two departments; and it would seem to me, as one Senator, that if that department is doing this work, and doing it efficiently, and taking care of all the demands for the education of these foreigners, it would be a useless expenditure of money to appropriate $35,000,000 to create another department to do it.

Mr. KENYON. Why, of course it would. It would be criminal and asinine.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. But that department is doing some work in the preparation of men for naturalization. It is not covering the field of this work. They have established these schools in my town and we have had citizens turn in and help, and they did considerable good; but that does not in any broad way cover this whole question. It can not do it. If it does, that is the end of it.

Mr. HARRISON. The object of this bill is to teach them how to read and write and speak the English language?

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. On the theory that that will make them better Americans. Now, the Senator says that what the Department of Labor has done is to prepare men for naturalization. In order to prepare them for naturalization, have they not tried to teach them how to speak and write the English language?

Mr. KENYON. They have, but they have not covered very many of them. They have done good work.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield now to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. I have almost forgotten what the point was, but it was this:

The introductory words of these two subdivisions, I think, make clear the difference. In the first place, under section 5 no money shall be paid to a State until it shall, through its legislature—now go to paragraph (e)—"require," as originally drawn, "under penalty"—that is stricken out, but "require" is the word; while, taking subdivision (f), it is not "required" at all, but the State "provides, as far as possible," or, as it now is, "as far as possible and practicable." That is the difference between the two. The one indicates that the State, in order that it may come under the provisions of the act, must require this course and provide laws requiring it, whereas in the other case it is to provide, as far as possible and practicable.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, there is a difference between the two. Nobody has ever contended to the contrary, so far as I know; but while the word "provide" is used in one place and "require" in another, the word "provide" is modified by what follows. Provide how? Provide, as far as possible. Now, I think that is going a good way, Mr. President. You must provide, as far as possible, what? To educate illiterates who are more than 21 years old and from that on up to 50. That is what you must do, as far as possible and practicable. You are not asked to do anything not practicable; and the Senator from Iowa says it does not provide for compulsion. Why, Mr. President, that depends on the Secretary of the Interior. It may provide for compulsion, and I do not know but that the Secretary of the Interior would be justified in it. He must not have this money spent for tomfoolery. The law provides that in certain lines you shall educate people who are more than 21 years old. They may have been born right here in America and have lived here all their lives. They may be purely Americans. They are illiterates, however, and you must educate them.

Now, the law says to the Secretary of the Interior: "You must require that State to go, as far as possible and practicable, in the education of those people." The question at once comes up, How far shall we go?

Suppose you are going to pass the law. Will it comply with the law to say, "We will have a night school in a few of the cities"? I doubt it, but I do not know. According to my judgment, you have not gone as far as possible and practicable yet, and you must make some provision for the education of those people. They must learn to read and write the English language. They must take a course in United States history, under the substitute that is pending. That is a valuable thing. Men are sometimes misunderstood when they talk about that kind of a provision. We would all be glad to have that done; but the point is that we are going to take money out of the Federal Treasury, and require the State to provide the school and duplicate the money that we put into it in order to accomplish that thing. I do not believe we ought to do it.

I am willing to appropriate Federal money to teach the foreigner who has been admitted into our country to read and write and speak the English language, but I am not willing to take Federal funds and go into some State and teach their citizenship up to 50 years old what they ought themselves to have taught them 25 years ago. If you would confine it to teaching children of school age, it seems to me there would be something practicable about it; but these men are working on the farms, they are working in the factories, some of them have large families to support, and are sending their children to the public schools. They have to clothe them and feed them, and you are going in some way to require the farmer to go to school, also. Now, those of us who oppose it are not objecting to the farmer having an education, but we do not believe you ought to use public funds, particularly at this time, and turn them over to the State in order that that may be done. A system of education that is practical educates the children; and even though mistakes have been made by the States in not doing that in the past, it is too much to expect that we should now undertake to remedy it and educate people who are 50 years old. It seems to me that we are going too far. It seems to me we are taking a step in the use of public funds that we ought to avoid.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? Outside of the objection that he raises as to compulsion, suppose a provision of this kind were added:

Provided further, That such course of education and instruction shall not be compulsory.

That would make that clear, and remove the objection, would it not?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. Of course, the Senator understands that I would still be opposed to it. I am opposed to spending public money to educate this particular class of people.

Mr. KENYON. Yes; I understand, but that is a different question.

Mr. NORRIS. But that would help it very much.

Mr. KENYON. On that theory the Senator and I can not agree, but on the other we would agree, that this shall not be compulsory; and I suggest to the Senator from South Dakota that he add that to his amendment.

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator from Iowa will offer that as an amendment, I will accept the amendment.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRONNA in the chair). The Chair will state to the Senator from Iowa that there is an amendment to the amendment pending.

Mr. KENYON. Oh, yes; I beg the Senator's pardon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia to the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may we have the amendment stated again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. In lines 1 and 2 of the amendment it is proposed to strike out the words "subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior."

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, if it were not for other provisions in the bill I should be tempted to oppose the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia; but I think possibly under subdivision (h) the matter is carefully guarded so that the interests of the Federal Government will be protected. I think, of course, there should be some supervision of these funds expended by the Federal Government, but I think subdivision (h) will cover it, and I accept the amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, this is such an important matter that I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Has any business been transacted since the last quorum call?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks it has. The Senator from Georgia has offered an amendment, and the Chair thinks one or two other amendments have been disposed of since the roll call was made.

Mr. KENYON. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Harris	McNary	Sheppard
Beckham	Harrison	New	Smith, Ga.
Capper	Hitchcock	Norris	Smoot
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Nugent	Spencer
Colt	Kellogg	Overman	Sterling
Dial	Kenyon	Owen	Sutherland
Edge	Kirby	Page	Wadsworth
Fletcher	Lenroot	Phipps	Walsh, Mass.
Frelinghuysen	McCumber	Pomerene
Gronna	McKellar	Reed

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] are detained on official business.

Mr. PHIPPS. I desire to state that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is engaged in holding a committee hearing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

The reading clerk called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. NELSON answered to his name when called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. KENYON. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be instructed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

Mr. TOWNSEND, Mr. MYERS, Mr. WALSH of Montana, Mr. SMITH of Maryland, Mr. CURTIS, Mr. FRANCE, Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, Mr. MCCORMICK, and Mr. JOHNSON of California entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. KIRBY. I announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] on account of illness. This announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. STERLING. I accept the amendment of the Senator from Georgia to my amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. The amendment has not been agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. I understand that disposes of it, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The READING CLERK. Strike out the words "subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior."

Mr. STERLING. I accept that amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Does not the Senator really think that those words should remain in? Who is going to approve it? The Secretary of the Interior has the approval.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, attention was called during the discussion of the amendment of the Senator from Georgia to my amendment to subdivision (h), which I think carefully guards the matter, so far as the Federal Government is concerned. Subdivision (h) provides for—the submission annually to the Secretary of the Interior a report which shall show the (1) plan for administration and supervision, (2) courses of study, (3) methods and kind of instruction, (4) equipment, (5) qualifications of teachers, supervisors, directors of education, and other necessary administrative officers or employees, (6) plans for the preparation of teachers, supervisors, and directors of education, and (7) receipts and expenditures of money for the preceding fiscal year.

Mr. SMOOT. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that subdivision (h) simply requires the submission annually to the Secretary of the Interior of a report, as just stated by the Senator; but there is nothing at all in subdivision (h) which requires the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. This requires an annual report to be made.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator is right. Yet I think the bill means, with this amendment, what the Senator considers it should mean. The bill leaves it to the State authorities to undertake to provide for handling this money to carry out the object of the bill. They must report to the Secretary of the Interior and show how they have done it. If they have not complied with the provisions of the bill, then he withholds the next year's appropriation from them.

Mr. SMOOT. But the bill does not provide that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, yes; that is in the bill. I sought to strike out the provision requiring that in the first instance they should submit their plan to him for his approval and putting the Secretary in control of the detailed plans of the States. I think that is an interference with the State management that is unnecessary.

Mr. SMOOT. As far as I am concerned, I would rather have an interference to begin with than to have it all started, and then be interfered with later by the Secretary of the Interior. I think that the State should not provide any means nor begin an organization for this class of schools until they know that the Secretary of the Interior would approve of them, and that is all there is in subdivision (f).

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am opposed to the Secretary having anything to do with the detailed plans of the State. I do not think it is any of his business, and I think it is a mistake to give the power to him.

Mr. SMOOT. The Secretary will have it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; he will not.

Mr. SMOOT. If it did not meet with his approval, as the Senator said, he would withhold the appropriation for the next year; so he passes upon it, anyhow.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am going to offer an amendment covering the provision in the other section, that the Secretary, when he does withhold it, shall report the facts to Congress and that Congress shall be the judge as to whether the State has complied with the requirements of the bill. The details are not controlled by the bill. It is the mere use the bill requires for the purpose. I am opposed to the Secretary of the Interior having anything to do with the details. If the States spend the money for the purpose required by the bill, then they are entitled to the money; and the State officers should have the discretion as to the plan.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Secretary has any power whatever to withhold the appropriation, then it may be withheld because of the fact that the plans are not satisfactory to him.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; he can not withhold it because the plans are not satisfactory to him. He can withhold if they do not use the money for the purpose, but he can not control the way they execute that purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, I am not going to be captious about the matter, but it does seem to me, if we want to protect not only the States but the Treasury of the United States, that we ought to allow the Secretary of the Interior to approve of the plan before the State goes any further.

Mr. KENYON. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Utah to subdivision (f) in connection with subdivision (h) of section 5. It seems to me that those two subdivisions protect the situation. I do not want the funds turned loose without any supervision whatever.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I have read section 7, and that provides in general terms and gives him the power to impose under the provisions of the bill. Subdivision (f), which we are now discussing, says:

> Provide, as far as possible, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, for the education of residents who are citizens of the United States of the age of 21 years or more or resident aliens—

And so forth.

What we should do is to strike out the words "subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior."

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from Georgia does not ask to strike out subdivision (h) and he has not asked to strike out section 7.

Mr. SMOOT. No; but subdivision (h), no matter what the States may do, simply provides for them to submit annually to the Secretary of the Interior a report which shall show the plans of administration and supervision. When those things are submitted, that is the end of it. They have complied with the requirements of subdivision (h).

Mr. KENYON. But it is not a question of what the Secretary of the Interior can do. If he is satisfied they are not carrying out the purposes of the bill, he can withhold the allotment; and, under section 10, that allotment comes every three months; so no particular harm could result. Suppose the work is going on and the Secretary of the Interior is satisfied they are not carrying out the terms of the act, then he can withhold that allotment, and in that way control the matter.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, if the Senator is right in his contention, it would be very much better for the Secretary of the Interior to approve of the plan under subdivision (f) before the State begins the organization, rather than three months afterwards.

Mr. KENYON. Does not the Senator believe, as a matter of common horse sense, as we call it out West, that when a State is doing this work it would take it up with the Secretary of the Interior and discuss it with him, just as the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Georgia and myself would discuss and decide what we were going to do? They are all working to one end.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the natural course to take, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. Of course, that is the course that would be taken.

Mr. SMOOT. That is why the bill was written that way, because of the fact that it directs them to do the very thing that ought to be done. But suppose some State does not do it and suppose there is no action taken on the part of the State that would be in any way opposed by the Secretary of the Interior, it does seem——

Mr. KENYON. Then he could withhold the funds.

Mr. SMOOT. Not to begin with, however.

Mr. KENYON. He could do so after three months.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; after three months, and then all the effort of the State up to that time would be lost.

Mr. KENYON. Knowing that he could do that after three months, the State certainly would be wise enough to adopt some plan to meet his approval. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply think it is weakening the provision.

Mr. KENYON. I, too, think it is.

Mr. SMOOT. But I am not going to object.

Mr. KENYON. But there are some Senators rather offended by the language, and if we can accomplish the same thing without being offensive I should like to do it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to give the Senator my conception of the distribution. Take the State of Utah. Suppose they receive from the National Government, under their census showing as to the number of residents who can not speak English, $10,000. The State authorities determine upon their own plan of spending that sum and the State appropriation of $10,000 in instructing residents to speak English. The Secretary of the Interior has nothing to do with your plan so long as you in good faith make a plan and spend the money for that purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. He does not for the first three months.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And he does not afterwards under the bill. He only has the right to see that the State has spent it for the purpose, which is the purpose of giving to its residents the ability to speak English. That is the extent of his control as I would establish it in the bill. I would strike out those provisions that require the original plan to go to him and give him the right to control the State's plan of conducting education. I would leave to the State entirely the determination of the plan, so long as the State spent the money for that purpose. The plan I would leave to the State. That is the distinction I make.

Mr. SMOOT. I fully understand the position of the Senator from Georgia. I think the original part of subdivision (f) accomplishes that, for it simply provides, in the very first place, that it must be approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I never would allow it. Because he does not approve that plan of instruction, he can not stop that appropriation; not at all.

Mr. SMOOT. He passes upon it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. He passes upon the question as to whether the State has used the money to teach English to residents, but the way of doing it or the mode of schools and the management of it should be left to the State authorities.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator from Georgia speaks of the use of money for educating the foreigner.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. To teach the foreigner or the resident to speak English.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That applies also to illiterates within the State.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is another branch.

Mr. SMOOT. No; it applies to citizens of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There are two branches, the removal of illiteracy, which applies to all, and the teaching of English. There are two classes on account of which the appropriation is made.

If there were illiterates in Utah the State would get a certain sum for them. If there were residents who could not speak English, no matter how literate they were, the State would get some for that use. The State must use the proportion which comes to it for illiteracy to remove illiteracy. It must use the portion that comes to it for teaching English for that purpose. The way of doing it, I think, should be left to the State, but it must use it for the purpose.

As I understand the bill, it would strike out the provision that if the Secretary of the Interior does not approve of the mode of doing it he can not stop the State from taking the money because he thinks he could point out to the State a better way of teaching English than it is using. I would leave the mode of instruction to State authorities. I would not have the Federal officials interfere with the mode of instruction, but I would only leave to the Secretary of the Interior the right to say that unless the States are in good faith spending the entire sum in that instruction they are not to have the money.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Do I understand that, so far as this applies to illiterates, the States also are to have a free hand as to how they shall spend the money among those illiterates or for the purpose of educating those illiterates without any let or hindrance from the Federal Government?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; I think they would.

Mr. STERLING. I hardly agree with the Senator from Georgia in that broad statement.

Mr. SMOOT. I certainly can not.

Mr. STERLING. Having accepted the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia, my purpose and intent would be that the State would have the initiative in the first place in adopting a course of study or providing for schools for those illiterates, whether they be citizens or aliens. The bill further provides for reports annually to the Secretary of the Interior. If those reports disclose that any State is not following out the purpose of the bill in providing facilities for the education of those illiterates, then I think the Secretary of the Interior might direct that the money to which the State would otherwise be entitled should be withheld.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator from South Dakota agree with the Senator from Georgia that the State should adopt the plan for spending the money which the Federal Government pays in educating illiterates, even though that plan is confined to only a portion of the people in the State?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not mean that, I will say to the Senator from Michigan. It must be in good faith spent in an effort to remove illiteracy from all of the illiterates. I do not think it would comply with the requirements of the act unless there were good faith, but the Secretary might think it should be a day school and the officers of the State might think a night school was better. The details of the plan, I think, ought to be left to the State authorities; but the money must be used in good faith to carry out the purpose of the act by removing illiteracy from all.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. May I ask the Senator from South Dakota, in the light of what the Senator from Utah has said, what is the meaning of section 11, which says:

That the Secretary of the Interior shall make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act, and may cooperate with any department or agency of the Government and request such agencies to cooperate with him and with the several States?

If I understand the meaning of that language, he is given——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I expect to offer an amendment later on, striking out that section.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. In view of section 11, and in view of the fact that no such amendment has been offered, it seems to me that the point contended for by the Senator from Utah is not very well taken.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have my amendment ready to offer.

Mr. SMOOT. The position I take is directly in accord with the remainder of the bill, including section 11. The position taken by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], if it be followed out, would require that section 11 must go out of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Certainly. Section 11 clothes the Secretary with absolute power to regulate the use of the entire fund, and only makes it permissible by his will whether any of the Federal authorities or State authorities may cooperate with it. In other words, he can control it as he sees fit.

Mr. STERLING. I differ from the Senator from South Carolina on that point. If the Secretary of the Interior has anything at all to do with the administration of the act, of course, he will have to make some rules and regulations. His powers and his authority are limited by other provisions of the bill, or at least he has no other power than such as is conferred by the other provisions of the bill, but they do give him some power. He is to receive and pass upon these annual reports submitted by the State authorities in regard to what they have done in carrying out the provisions of the bill, in regard to what they have done in reference to providing facilities, and so forth, for the education of the illiterates. He can make rules and regulations appertaining to those matters, but that is all he can do.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The language of section 11 could not possibly be more potential than where it provides that he shall make such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary to carry out the purpose of the act. It takes in the whole act, and the purpose and operation and administration and execution of the act are entirely subject to his rules and regulations.

Mr. STERLING. Subdivision (f), the one under consideration now, makes it all permissive. The States are simply to provide, at their option always, the facilities for the education of the illiterates.

Mr. SMOOT. But if the State does not provide, under subdivision (f), for the education of the citizens and aliens named in the subdivision, then all the balance of the requirement under the subdivision, if complied with, would not entitle it to receive for any purpose any part of the money appropriated in the bill.

Mr. STERLING. That may be.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly the way the bill reads. I desire to say to the Senator further in relation to section 11 that the Senator knows very well that wherever the power is given to the Secretary of the Interior to make rules and regulations, that power is so potent that he can almost set aside the laws that are passed by Congress. How often has it been done in relation to the public lands of our Western States?

"Rules and regulations." What does that mean? Under section 11 the Secretary of the Interior would have the power to say to the State of Georgia, "Unless you educate, under subdivision (f) of the bill, 5,000 alien illiterates you can not have any portion of the money." The Secretary of the Interior can go that far, or he can make such rules as that they shall hold school only between the hours of 11 o'clock in the morning and 1 o'clock in the afternoon. He has that power under section 11.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have offered an amendment to strike out section 11. This is the first one we have come to, and that is the reason why my motion was made, because the amendment was offered.

Mr. SMOOT. There seemed to be such a wide difference of opinion between the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] in regard to the powers vested in the Secretary of the Interior under section 11, that I have taken a little time to explain how I construed section 11, and to what extent that power would virtually place in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior the direction of every plan in the States.

Mr. HARRISON. Under that section, does not the Senator think the Secretary of the Interior might prescribe what textbooks should be used in the schools?

Mr. SMOOT. Under the rules and regulations he could.

Mr. HARRISON. That authority in the various States is now given to school commissions, textbook commissions, and so forth.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true, but in all such cases the State pays the whole of the expense of carrying on the education.

Mr. HARRISON. That is true; but if they wanted to get any of this money they would have to change the rule, divest themselves of that power, and give it over to the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes, as far as the provisions of the bill are concerned.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator from Utah contend that under section 11 the Secretary of the Interior could determine what textbooks should be used in the schools?

Mr. SMOOT. I think under section 11 he could make a rule or regulation that a certain textbook should be used in the schools.

Mr. KENYON. He can make certain rules and regulations to carry out the purposes of this act. The purposes of this act are the teaching of English.

Mr. SMOOT. That is one of the purposes.

Mr. KENYON. Yes; that is the only compulsory feature of the act.

Mr. SMOOT. And the teaching of English requires a textbook, and he can make a rule that a certain textbook shall be used.

Mr. KENYON. Oh, he might make a rule that heads should be cut off, but it would not amount to anything. It is easy to raise objections of that kind for the purpose of defeating a measure.

Mr. SMOOT. I have been led into this. I never intended to speak on it at all.

Mr. KENYON. I think the Senator has a wrong lead on it.

Mr. SMOOT. That may be; but I am quite sure that if the bill passes as it is now the Senator from Utah has not a wrong lead. But what I was going to ask the Senator from South Dakota—and that is what I rose for—was about the proviso to his amendment:

Provided, That any course of education or instruction under this subdivision or under subdivision (e) shall especially include instruction in American history, the fundamentals of civil government, and the principles of the Constitution of the United States.

Does the Senator think that it is wise to put such a proviso on subdivision (f) as I have just read? Why enumerate any of the courses of instruction that are to be given?

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, the idea I had in mind when I added that was that in doing so I was simply carrying out a little more effectually the purposes of this bill, which are the Americanization of the illiterates, and especially of the illiterate foreigners—those who can not read, write, or speak the English language. Here they are, and they understand nothing about American institutions, American government, American history. Why should they not be taught, either by textbook or by lecture, the principles and fundamentals of civil government? That is the essential thing. It is because of their lack of knowledge of these things that they are an undesirable or a dangerous element; but if we instruct them in American history, the principles of civil government, and the principles of the Constitution of the United States we will let them know then what our institutions are.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no earthly need for this bill being before the Senate of the United States if that is not the very purpose of the bill. What I object to is simply enumerating here in the bill, as set out in this proviso, just what courses of instruction shall be given under subdivisions (e) and (f).

Mr. KENYON. That does not include all of them.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no; I know it does not, but the very purpose of the bill, the title of the bill, is to promote Americanization. How on earth could you ever promote it without teaching American history and the fundamentals of civil government?

Mr. KENYON. Then what possible harm does it do to say so?

Mr. SMOOT. The only reason I can see for the inclusion of these words is to call attention to the fact that this is a bill for the purpose of teaching Americanization. That is stated in the title of the bill. I will admit that this is about the only provision in the bill that has any reference to it; but there is more bad legislation passed by trying to enumerate what it is to provide than in almost any other way.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, if it emphasizes the fact that it is to Americanize, and that that is the purpose of the bill, it will have accomplished a purpose. You can infer from certain provisions of this bill that it is simply to teach men to speak and read and write the English language. We do not want this education confined to that. We want them instructed especially in the principles of American government, and that was the idea in putting this in the bill. It emphasizes that proposition.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Georgia a very frank question. He is always frank with me. There is a thought arising out of the matter we are discussing, and we might as well have it right out.

Suppose a situation like this arose—that the money that went to a State under this bill should be used entirely for the whites, and nothing for the blacks?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think we will have any of it until next year. What we want this for in my State is almost entirely to help for the other purpose.

Mr. KENYON. Yes; I know; but no one need close his eyes to the fact that there is a black cloud that is interfering with the passage of this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In this way: If the Secretary of the Interior, for instance, could insist that whites and blacks should be educated together, of course, the State would decline the funds.

Mr. KENYON. Certainly; but if the Secretary of the Interior found that they were simply using the money for the whites, and none of it for the blacks, then could he not stop the funds?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. He could stop the funds the next year absolutely. I do not think there is a doubt but that the bill goes to that extent.

Mr. KENYON. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, in that connection, on yesterday the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] offered an amendment. He is not here to-day. He is sick. It would seem to me that that amendment ought to be offered as an amendment to the Senator's amendment.

Mr. KENYON. That comes at the end of section 11.

Mr. HARRISON. Very well.

Mr. KENYON. We will discuss that when we get to it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, has the Senator any objection to that? As he knows, in the South we have separate schools.

Mr. KENYON. There is no intention to interfere with that. I will say to the Senator that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. NUGENT] spoke to me about that amendment as affecting his State, where there are just a few colored people and they do not have separate schools. He said that that should be fixed up in some way to take care of cases of that kind, and I have no objection.

Mr. SMOOT. For instance, I will call attention to the State of Utah. We have not enough colored men in the State of Utah to have a school for them anywhere in the State. I think there are only two cities in the whole State that have any at all, and there are not nearly enough of them there to have separate schools.

Mr. McKELLAR. The amendment submitted by my colleague, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] could easily be arranged so as to take care of that situation; and it ought to be done, I think.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, was the amendment of the Senator from Georgia disposed of?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was accepted by the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. KENYON. Then I offer this amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota, at the close:

Provided further, That such course of education or instruction shall not be compulsory.

Mr. STERLING. I accept that amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, if a vote is going to come on the amendment, it is a rather important one, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I understand that the amendment is disposed of, for the time being, by its acceptance.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from South Dakota accepted the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, and now the vote is to come on the amendment as amended; and I say it is a matter of importance, and we ought to have a quorum present.

Mr. KENYON. Let us dispose of this offer of the amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. I thought the Senator's amendment had been accepted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been. Both the modification of the Senator from Georgia and the modification of the Senator from Iowa have been accepted by the Senator from South Dakota, and the question will be on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

Mr. KENYON. I move that not later than 5 o'clock p. m. the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow. I understand that an executive session is desired.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KENYON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. KENYON. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, January 24, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 23, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee, our Father in heaven, that the Christian religion is coming to its own, since it is no longer a riddle to be solved but a life to be lived.

Metaphysics, speculative theology are fast passing; the churches are getting together; conventionalities, forms, ceremonies are regarded only as stepping stones.

Christ lives and is abroad in the earth—illustrated by the Red Cross, the Christian Endeavor, the Knights of Columbus, the Salvation Army, and a thousand philanthropic organizations whose object is to throw safeguards around the children, young men and young women, to save them from the hells of this life and fit them for the life revealed in the Jesus of Nazareth. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EFFICIENCY AND PERSONNEL OF THE NAVY AND COAST GUARD.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas submits a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to which was referred H. Res. ——, submit a privileged report on said resolution with the recommendation that it be adopted:

"Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this rule it shall be in order for the Speaker to recognize the Member in charge of H. R. 11927 to move to suspend the rules and pass the bill, being a bill 'To increase the efficiency and personnel of the Navy and Coast Guard through temporary provision of bonus or increased compensation,' the general rules of the House to the contrary notwithstanding."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, is the gentleman from Kansas certain that this is a privileged resolution?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. He is.

Mr. BLANTON. If he was not, I wanted to reserve a point of order on it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The purpose of the rule is to make it in order for the gentleman in charge of the bill referred to to move to suspend the rules and pass the bill. The bill is reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs——

Mr. BUTLER. Unanimously.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Unanimously, as I am informed, providing increased pay for certain men in the Navy. I understand the higher officers, and, in fact, all the commissioned officers of the Navy are eliminated from the bill. It simply provides for enlisted men and petty officers.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state why an important measure of this sort is brought in under a rule suspending the rules when there can be only 20 minutes' debate on a side instead of being brought in in the usual way?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The purpose is to make it in order to move to suspend the rules to-day rather than to wait for 10 days, because of the emergency that exists in the Navy. Does the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] desire any time?

Mr. POU. We do not care for any time.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If no one desires time on the rule, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I wish the gentleman would withhold that until I can make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I withhold the motion.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I should like to ask how the Speaker could refer this resolution to the Committee on Rules when the rule itself refers to it as "H. Res. blank"?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think I can answer the question of the gentleman from Missouri. The rule was prepared in manuscript and not printed, to meet this emergency, just as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] has prepared rules with a lead pencil and had them agreed to within five minutes after they were written.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I just wanted to know.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. This is one of that kind.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield for a question.

Mr. GARD. Who is the gentleman of the Naval Affairs Committee referred to in the rule who has charge of the presentation of this bill?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I understand the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY] has charge of the bill.

Mr. GARD. It is the purpose under this rule to pass this bill exactly as it is, without any opportunity for amendment?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Under the rules of the House a motion to suspend the rules admits of 40 minutes' debate. After that a vote on the bill without amendment or just as the bill is presented to the House is had.

Mr. GARNER. How much money does this take out of the Treasury?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan to answer that question.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. About $10,000,000 annually.

Mr. GARNER. And I understand the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], on the spur of the moment, in the emergency, pencils a resolution without any number, and wants the House to consider it, and moves the previous question on a proposition to give 20 minutes' debate on a side on a bill which takes $10,000,000 a year out of the Treasury.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. That looks to me like rapid-fire economy—electric economy, I might term it—20 minutes on a side to discuss a question that involves taking $10,000,000 a year out of the Treasury.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. There have been many hours of discussion in the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BUTLER. We have had it under consideration for four months.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The Committee on Naval Affairs have had it under consideration ever since last October, and the Secretary of the Navy has written twice, asking for much more than is provided for by the bill.

Mr. GARNER. The committee have had it since last October. There have been four months' consideration in the Committee on Naval Affairs. About how much consideration has it had by the steering committee?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am unable to inform the gentleman from Texas, not being a member of the steering committee.

Mr. GARNER. If it took four months in the Committee on Naval Affairs and two weeks in the steering committee, I am wondering why you allow only 20 minutes' debate on a side in the House? That is the way you legislate here. It takes a committee of the House four months, and takes the steering committee 10 days, and then you allow 20 minutes on a side, on a bill taking $10,000,000 a year out of the Treasury.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It takes several months to grow a plum, and just a moment to pick it. We are picking it here this morning. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves the previous question.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 72, noes 18.

So the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question being taken, Mr. BLANTON and Mr. WALSH demanded a division.

The House proceeded to divide.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the House having divided, I make the point of no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum present. There is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, and the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees. Those in favor of agreeing to the resolution will, as their names are called, vote "yea," those opposed "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 297, nays 30, not voting 101, as follows:

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 11927) to increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy and Coast Guard through the temporary provision of bonuses or increased compensation, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That commencing January 1, 1920, a bonus shall be paid to commissioned warrant and warrant officers of the Navy, in addition to all pay and allowances now or hereafter allowed by law, at rates per annum as follows: Commissioned warrant officers, $480; warrant officers, $240.

That commencing January 1, 1920, the following shall be the rate of base pay for each enlisted rating: Chief petty officers with acting appointments, $99 per month; chief petty officers with permanent appointments and mates, $126 per month; petty officers, first class, $84 per month; petty officers, second class, $72 per month; petty officers, third class, $60 per month; nonrated men, first class, $54 per month; nonrated men, second class, $48 per month; nonrated men, third class, $33 per month: Provided, That the base pay of firemen, first class, shall be $60 per month; firemen, second class, $54 per month; firemen, third class, $48 per month: Provided further, That the rate of base pay for each rating in the Naval Academy Band shall be as follows: Second leader, with acting appointment, $99 per month; with permanent appointment, $126 per month; drum major, $84 per month; musicians, first class, $72 per month; musicians, second class, $60 per month: Provided further, That the base pay of cabin stewards and cabin cooks shall be $84 per month; wardroom stewards and wardroom cooks, $72 per month; steerage stewards and steerage cooks, $72 per month; warrant officers' stewards and warrant officers' cooks, $60 per month; mess attendants, first class, $42 per month; mess attendants, second class, $36 per month; mess attendants, third class, $33 per month: Provided further, That the retainer pay of those members of the Fleet Naval Reserve who, pursuant to call, shall return to active duty within one month after the passage of this act and shall continue on active duty until the Navy shall have been recruited up to its permanent authorized strength, shall be computed upon the base pay they are receiving when retransferred to inactive duty, plus the additions or increases prescribed in the naval appropriation act approved August 29, 1916, for members of the Fleet Naval Reserve.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized, in his discretion, to readjust the prevailing rates of pay of civilian professors and instructors at the United States Naval Academy: Provided, That said readjustment, which shall be effective from January 1, 1920, shall not involve an additional expenditure in excess of $55,000 for the remainder of the current fiscal year.

SEC. 4. That commissioned warrant and warrant officers, petty officers, and other enlisted men of the Coast Guard shall receive the same pay and allowances and bonuses as are now or may hereafter be prescribed for corresponding grades or ratings and length of service in the Navy; and the grades and ratings of warrant officers, chief petty officers, petty officers, and other enlisted persons in the Coast Guard shall be the same as in the Navy, in so far as the duties of the Coast Guard may require, with the continuance in the Coast Guard of the grade of surfman, whose base pay shall be $70 per month.

SEC. 5. That nothing contained in this act shall be construed as granting any back pay or allowances to any commissioned warrant or warrant officer or enlisted man whose active service shall have terminated subsequent to December 31, 1919, and prior to the passage of this act, unless such commissioned warrant or warrant officers or enlisted men shall have been recalled to active service or shall have been reenlisted.

SEC. 6. That any enlisted man or apprentice seaman who, having been honorably discharged from the naval service, shall reenlist within one year thereafter shall, on presenting his honorable discharge or on accounting in a satisfactory manner for its loss, be entitled to a gratuity of four months' pay equal in amount to that which he would have received if he had been employed in actual service during the four months immediately following his honorable discharge from the naval service, and shall receive all the benefits of continuous service: Provided, That this section shall become inoperative within six months after the date of the approval of this act.

SEC. 7. That the foregoing provisions of this act, except sections 3 and 4, shall remain effective until the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, unless sooner amended or repealed: Provided, That the rates of pay prescribed in section 2 hereof shall be the rates of pay during the current enlistment of all men in active service on the date of the passage of this act, and for those who enlist, reenlist, or extend their enlistments prior to July 1, 1921, for the term of such enlistment, reenlistment, or extended enlistment.

SEC. 8. That the appropriation "Pay of the Navy, 1920," is hereby made available for any of the expenses authorized by this act, and any part or all of the appropriation "Provisions, Navy, 1920," not required for the objects of expenditure specified in said appropriation may be transferred to the appropriation "Pay of the Navy, 1920": Provided, That any money remaining to the credit of the appropriation "Pay of the Navy, 1920," shall be available for supplementing, if necessary, such current appropriations of the Coast Guard as have been provided for the pay and allowances of officers and men of the Coast Guard.

That nothing contained in this act shall operate to reduce the pay of any commissioned warrant or warrant officer or enlisted man of the Navy or Coast Guard: Provided, That the allowances and gratuities now authorized by existing law are not changed hereby, except as otherwise specified in this act.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Alabama 20 minutes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill intended to give temporary relief to the enlisted personnel of the Navy. It provides increased pay until the 30th of June, 1921, and does not continue beyond that time. The situation in the Navy is exceedingly critical so far as the skilled men are concerned. When the armistice was signed the Navy had about 500,000 men. It was demobilized by the 1st of July last to 275,000 men, and at the present time there are about 100,000 men in the Navy. Those 100,000 men who are now in the Navy are nearly all young boys, 18, 19 years of age, and the skilled mechanics and officers of the enlisted personnel necessary to man these complicated ships and take care of the machinery, the boilers, and the engines, have nearly all left the service. At the present time, while we have an enlisted force of about 100,000 men, the shortage in these higher ratings is so great that we have not really a force of more than 45,000 men for the ships and for the shore stations. As a result of this shortage of skilled men the great majority of ships of the Navy to-day are tied up. We took about half of the fleet to the Pacific, but as soon as it arrived there the term of enlistment of thousands of men expired and they were discharged under legislation previously passed by Congress. Therefore, the greater portion of the Navy in the Pacific to-day is tied up at the navy yard at Mare Island and the navy yard at Bremerton for lack of men to man the ships in these higher ratings. The Navy Department has scoured the training stations for men who have had any degree of mechanical training. If a boy has been in school for two or three months, or perhaps a less time, at one of these training stations, where ordinarily he would remain a year pursuing his mechanical course, the Navy Department has taken him out and sent him to sea.

But even then the majority of the ships of the Navy are not really in commission to-day. This is a most dangerous situation so far as the the ships and the men are concerned. Gentlemen will appreciate what a complicated thing a warship is. It has cost the Government sometimes as high as $20,000,000 and has on board fifteen or sixteen hundred men, and the greatest of danger would result in having inexperienced boys 18 or 19 years of age attending the engines and boilers. An explosion might occur at any time with great loss of property and loss of life. Damage already has resulted on some of the smaller ships from this cause. The reason for this shortage of skilled men is apparent. The man who has been in the Navy for a few years is an ideal man for the merchant ships. During the last two or three years we have increased the merchant shipping of this country to something like 10,000,000 tons, and the merchant service is constantly reaching out to get skilled mechanics, to get these enginemen and firemen and others who have been trained in the Navy, and is offering twice as much pay as they are receiving in the Navy. So that the difficulties of keeping them in the service are very great. Not only that, but the general wage throughout the country, as we all know, is so much higher than it was formerly that these skilled mechanics are sought for in factories all over the country. We are paying on the average $6.40 a day in the navy yards for skilled mechanics while a man in the Navy occupying a position of great importance on board ship has been getting $83 a month. If he went out of the service and went into the navy yard he could draw as high as $2,000 a year. These two causes taken together have resulted in taking the skilled men out of the Navy, so that to-day we are short of these skilled ratings something in the neighborhood of forty or forty-five thousand, based upon the normal strength of the Navy of 143,000 men.

In this bill we have provided for increases in pay on an average of about 33⅓ per cent over and above what they are now getting. We do not increase the pay of the apprentice seamen. The boys who are going into the service now are young boys. They have to spend five or six months in school before they are of any service to the Government, and we have not increased their initial pay. We did not think it was necessary to do so. Above the grade of apprentice seaman we increase the pay from 33⅓ per cent to 50 per cent.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I heartily agree with the idea of the gentleman and his committee in raising the pay of those men in the bill, but I notice that there is no provision whatever made for an increase in the pay of the commissioned officers of the Navy whose pay has not been raised since the year 1908, if I am correctly informed.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That is true, and I will say to the gentleman that the Secretary of the Navy did recommend an increase in the pay of the commissioned officers, and in my own judgment the officers of the Navy, especially those in the grades of commander, lieutenant commander, and lieutenant, are in dire need in many cases of relief; but there would be controversy over increasing the pay of the officers. This legislation which we have proposed is so vital, so absolutely necessary, and so pressing at the moment that we decided to report a bill carrying an increase for the men without the officers and at another time take up the question the gentleman referred to. I am fully in accord with the sentiment he has expressed.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Then the effect of this bill will be, if it becomes a law, that some of the warrant officers will draw more money than some of the commissioned officers.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I think that is true even now, and is not at all improper. The commissioned warrant officer is a man who has gone up through all the grades of the Navy and gained his rating by his experience on board ship. That necessarily makes him, when he reaches the highest grade that he can reach, a man pretty well along in years. He is a man 40 or 45 years of age, and, of course, he has a family to support on shore. He gets the same pay as an ensign, who graduates from the academy, but who has not, generally speaking, any family, and whose expenses are very light. If we increase the pay of the man of mature years, the skilled man, who could easily secure a position as master of a merchant ship, the man with a family, I think we are doing what we ought to do. Understand me, I have no controversy over the question of whether the commissioned officer should have his salary increased under present conditions, because I think he should have more pay, especially in the lower ratings, but I feel that his necessities are not so great as the skilled mechanic, the man 40 or 45 years of age, who has a family on shore to take care of. That is why we put in the bill the provision for a bonus for the commissioned warrant officer and the warrant officer and did not include the ensign or lieutenant.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I sincerely hope this committee will before very long report out a bill that will attempt to do justice to the commissioned officers of the Navy.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Did not the gentleman's committee report a bill providing for an increase of salary of the commissioned personnel of the Navy?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. No. The Naval Committee reached an agreement on a bill of that kind, but it never was reported.

Mr. CALDWELL. Did not the gentleman's committee appoint a subcommittee to confer with a subcommittee of the Military Committee on the matter of reporting a bill to increase the pay of the commissioned personnel of both the Army and the Navy?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. We did have some negotiations with the Military Committee on the question of the pay of officers, but we never really formulated any plans or came to any understanding.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, the committee, however, some two months ago did agree on a bill providing for an increase of the officers' pay.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes; but we never reported it.

Mr. OLIVER. My recollection is that the committee directed it to be reported.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The gentleman asked if we had not reported the bill, and I said we had not.

Mr. OLIVER. There was opposition, however, on the part of some who would provide a rule for the reporting out of the bill, and for that reason we could not get consideration.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Further, the bill which the Committee on Naval Affairs agreed upon did not carry any provisions for the personnel of the Army.

I think, perhaps, gentlemen, I had best reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I wanted to ask the gentleman two questions. The first one is: If there is this scarcity of these men in the Navy, why would it not be a good idea to take these graduates from the Naval Academy, and men who have been serving in the Coast Guard for many years, and put them in the Navy to help?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The Coast Guard is in as bad a condition as the Navy. That service has no skilled men to spare. There is a shortage of a thousand men in the Coast Guard out of a total of 5,000.

Mr. LINTHICUM. There are guardsmen there that have been serving for 25 years.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. They are officers. This bill deals with the enlisted force only.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to ask the gentleman if it is the intention of your committee to take care of the commissioned officers of the Navy? Is there any immediate prospect of doing that?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The officers?

Mr. LINTHICUM. The commissioned officers?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Nothing has been done so far.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Is there any prospect of anything being done?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I will say to the gentleman that, in my opinion and in the opinion of the members of the committee, some relief ought to be given to at least the lower grades of the commissioned personnel of the Navy. I can not, of course, forecast the future action of the committee.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman heard a lot about the steering committee in connection with the rivers and harbors bill. Are they injecting anything in it to hold this back?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I am not a member of the steering committee, and I wish the gentleman would direct his query to somebody who is a member of that committee.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would like to ask the gentleman how much of an increase of appropriation is involved in this bill?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The increase in appropriation is about $10,000,000; but we will save, I will say to the gentleman from North Carolina, if these men come back, as we expect they will, $100 per man—clothing allowance and much of the expense of recruiting. This saving will greatly reduce the amount I have stated.

Mr. KITCHIN. Now, if the increase which is asked applied to officers, how much would it have been?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. It would be the small end, I will say to the gentleman. The officers' increase would not amount to as much as the increase for the men. I will say, further, that this bill does not carry any appropriation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. This bill does not carry any appropriation and none will be needed, because in the last naval bill we appropriated for an average of 190,000 men for this entire fiscal year; whereas, as a matter of fact, there are now only 100,000 men in the Navy, and the average will fall considerably below what we expected. So there should be a large sum of money turned back into the Treasury after the increase provided in this bill has been taken care of.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I will.

Mr. MILLER. I see that the letter of the Secretary says that those in similar positions in the Shipping Board get two and one-half times the pay of the Navy?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That is true.

Mr. MILLER. And the increase is about 33⅓ per cent?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That is true.

Mr. MILLER. Have you any assurance that you will get the desired men with that increase, even including the bonuses?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I think this will do the business. Of course, nobody can tell, but the men themselves seem to think that considering the superior service of the Navy, the better care that they have in the Navy, the love of the service, and all that, and the retiring benefits, if they stay in the Navy long enough, that, everything taken together, this increase would induce the men that are in now to stay, and will get back those who have left during the last six or eight months.

Mr. MILLER. It is the judgment of the committee that the men will come back?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. It is the judgment of the committee and the judgment of the Bureau of Navigation.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. KINCHELOE. What is the purpose of section 6? What is the purpose of giving them four months' back pay contingent on the fact that they reenlist? Is that for the purpose of getting back these experienced fellows that have gone out?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky this, that when a man's term in the Navy expires, after he has served for four years, he is given a four months' leave, practically, and if he reenlists within the four months he gets four months' pay. You can see why that is so. A young man goes into the Navy; he is away from home for four years, and if you did not give him a chance to go home for three or four months once in four years you would probably lose that man altogether. So the Government has been giving him four months' pay provided he reenlisted within that time. But we extend the time in this bill, so that if he comes back in six months or eight months he will get the four months' pay that he would have gotten if he had come back within the four months.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Suppose that he reenlists in a different rank than that which he had when he was discharged?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. He would not do that. He would get four months' pay in the rank in which he served when he went out.

Mr. Speaker, if there are no other questions, I will reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman reserves one minute.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be advised when I have used 10 minutes.

My objections to this bill are threefold. In two grounds of my opposition I am pretty strenuous. In the middle ground I am rather mild.

I object, first, to taking up a matter of this importance in this way—that is, by motion to suspend the rules, and under House rules no amendment to the bill can be offered and only 40 minutes of debate can be had. It is a bad way in which to take up legislation. It affords no opportunity for amendment, and no fair opportunity for discussion or understanding. It is quite obvious to me, and must be to the House as a whole, that this bill is brought forward in this particular way for the very purpose of preventing an amendment to the bill.

The rule proposed by the committee might just as well have made the bill in order and provided for taking it up regularly. Had that been done, the bill would have been subject to amendment. But evidently those who are responsible for bringing up the bill in this fashion do not want it amended and do not want the House to really understand what they are doing. So much for that.

My second ground for objection is mild. It is based chiefly upon my opposition to a close adherence to the scriptural text that—

> For he that hath, to him shall be given; and to him that hath not, from him shall be taken even that which he hath.

I do not approve of that principle in legislation or anywhere else. This bill gives the biggest part of the increase to the men who are already getting the most. It gives the increase to the highest ratings, and to the lowest of all it gives nothing at all.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY] speaks of those who enlist as being "boys," and hence entitled to little pay. Well, nobody but a boy can be roped in on any such pay as is given for the lowest rating.

Mr. STEPHENS of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Excuse me, I would be glad to yield, but I have not the time. That is the reason they are not getting anybody but boys, and the department has been taking mere boys 16 and 17 years of age, "trundle-bed trash," out of my district against the will of their parents, and without their authority and consent until patience has ceased to be a virtue. That is an actual fact. We ought to have a Navy that is a men's Navy, and leave these boys at home to get their education and receive the training that they ought to have until they are 18 or 19 years old, instead of roping them in under what is in some cases almost false pretenses. We ought to increase the men's wages so that a grown man can afford to join the Navy. This bill does not do it, and it ought not to pass for that reason.

But there is another thing that is more serious than this. I see here in the bill that an additional bonus is to be paid to the men who come back into the Navy, having been heretofore discharged. A bonus of four months' pay is to be given them, a bonus for men to come back into the Navy, and yet no additional bonus is given to the boys who served during the war, when there was real need for men, a need much more acute than now. They must be content with the $60 which they have already received.

The very first thing I did following the armistice, at the session of Congress which began on December 1, 1918, was to introduce a bill to give to each honorably discharged soldier and sailor $180, or six months' pay. That bill was not allowed to come before the House. All the boys got was a miserly $60, not enough to buy a civilian outfit. Those now responsible for legislation in the House do not intend that any such measure shall come before this House. They do not purpose to give the House a chance to vote on the question whether we will give to these boys who served their country in the war a respectable bonus. They have decided for this House, in the committee room and in the secret caucus, that no recognition shall be given by way of bonus to the men who served their country in the Great War.

I object to that and am compelled to protest against it, though my voice be never so feeble. Had we given to these boys, at the time this matter was first brought forward, a reasonable and respectable bonus, the matter would have been ended forever; but we whittled them down to $60, a mere pittance, and turned them loose; and now we will have the matter coming up and up again, and agitation going on all over the country, with propositions to pay bonuses of extravagant amounts.

But that there should be some additional bonus allowed, I challenge any Member of the House to deny. No man dare take the position before the country that these men who served on the front line and upon the tossing billows should not have some recognition beyond the little pay which they received. Nobody dares do that. Yet there are those who dare in the privacy of the committee room and in secret caucus to refuse to allow the House of Representatives, which is authorized to speak for the people of the United States, an opportunity to consider or to take any action upon that question.

I leave it to those who are responsible for such action to answer first to their consciences. We sat in our comfortable seats; these boys went overseas and risked their lives. Then I ask these men, when they have answered to their consciences, to answer their constituency and the people of America at large, why, oh why, they are so niggardly with the men who actually went to the front? They have been willing, practically all of them, to vote to take care of war contractors, to make good any business losses that have been sustained. They have been tender with business. They have been, oh, never so regardful of property rights. But what respect have they shown for human rights—what respect to the boys who made their sacrifices in France?

I want to say now, for myself, that no measure for the relief of these men will be presented on the floor of this House to which I will not be willing to give adherence. I would be willing, if necessary, to pay out of my own pocket not merely my per capita share but according to my means and ability to pay whatever may be found necessary.

I would think I got off light—I, who stayed at home in a safe place and slept in bed and had good food and enjoyed the love and society of my family and friends—I should think that I got off light if I gave my whole fortune for the benefit of those boys who went away, who risked their lives, who suffered every pang, and who, back at home now, get, many of them, small comfort and very small recognition.

Oh, we were glad to get them to go. "Brave, brave boys." And big business men shouted and said, "Go on to the front! You are heroes!" But when the boys came back they did little shouting. "The shouting and the tumult had died away." There were few to meet them at the station. They stole in quietly, as though they had been on a pleasure trip. When they meet them on the street many of those who lauded them on as "heroes" are afraid to look the discharged soldier in the eye for fear he will strike them for a job or perhaps ask for a cigarette.

Gentlemen, answer to your consciences, you who have charge of the responsibilities of this House and for its action. You must answer to the country for what may be done upon this matter.

Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PELL].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. PELL. Mr. Speaker, I expect to vote for this bill on the ground that almost any bill of this sort is better than none.

But it seems to me that a great mistake is being made in not including the commissioned officers, men who have been trained, whose training and education have cost the Government really great sums of money, who are in a position to-day, every man of them, to go out and draw a salary of two or three or four times as much as they are getting to-day from the United States.

These men are held in their places to-day by the traditions of the Navy and their own genuine patriotism. That loyalty which we have always had from our naval officers has been a thing in which every American should take a proper pride, and we have a right here to ask those men for loyalty. But we have not got a right to ask them for martyrdom. We have not got the right to take men upon whom we impose tremendous responsibilities and place them in a position where it is quite impossible for them to live. An officer must live like a gentleman. He must spend a certain sum of money on appearances. He must keep his family properly. And it is to-day absolutely impossible for any officer to do so on his salary, and we are losing by resignation thousands of men every day who may some day be needed. Those men with their spirit, their training, and their organization can not easily be replaced. The time will come when this so-called economy will be shown to be the most terrific extravagance.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five minutes. The Chair discovers, on examination, that a gentleman to whom time is yielded can not yield to others except by unanimous consent.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. How much time have I consumed, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman used eight minutes and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PELL] used two minutes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Before yielding to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], I will first yield three minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this bill. I understand that the reason why we had this peculiar rule a few moments ago is that, if you did not shut off debate and amendments, it was feared that some gentleman would offer an amendment to increase the appropriation in this bill—to put in higher salaries for the officers—and therefore they desired to pass this bill under a suspension of the rules, which would prevent all amendments.

If that was the purpose, it was very wise. I want to ask the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] a question. I do not see him here now. Or I want to ask the committee this question: Is this really a sincere stand or position which the Republicans in the House are going to take, or is this bill cutting down the appropriations below the requests of the Navy Department some several million dollars simply a pretext in order to give the distinguished gentleman from Wyoming justification to issue his little weekly or semimonthly statements as to the great economy which this House is effecting? [Laughter.]
